*Some light on this phase may perhaps be shed from another angle of the Commission's work. In its study of the different occupations and their relation to the period of impairment, railroad workers have not only given the highest accident rate, but of all cases investigated not one impairment was due to old age—in other words to continuity of service. The health and earning power of 75 per cent. of these workers were impaired before 50 years of age on account of sickness or accident.

compensated groups, a comparatively high standard of living is required of them. Sufficient saving for old age under the circumstances is thus out of the question. To this must be added the obvious fact that many in the teaching profession—especially is this the case with women teachers—remain unmarried, and ordinarily, have no one to depend upon in their old age. That teachers, living continuously in the dread of approaching old age, are not the most desirable persons for the instruction and inspiration of our younger generations, is so evident that it hardly merits further emphasis.

It is rather surprising to learn that although the United States led the world in establishing compulsory educational laws at public expense, it is one of the last to make provision for the care and relief of superannuated and aged teachers. While Russia established a system of relief for its teachers as early as 1819, the first such laws in this country did not come until 1893 and 1894 when Chicago and New York City teachers secured the passage of such laws in their respective legislatures.

Pennsylvania established its first compulsory educational law in 1901. The first action with regard to Teachers' Retirement Funds came in 1905 when a special act of the legislature providing for "the control, administration and support of the common schools in the school district of the first class" also provided in Section 6 of the same act that "A Teachers' Retirement Fund may be created by the Board of Public Education, and shall be by them administered. The said fund shall consist of all funds available for like purposes at the time of the enactment of this law, together with such additions thereto as the Board may from time to time prescribe, and such moneys as may be donated or bequeathed for such purposes. Any teacher, principal or supervising official retired by the Board of Public Education shall receive from the said Fund such annuity as the Board of Public Education may prescribe." This fund became operative in Philadelphia on January 1, 1907.

It was not, however, until May 23, 1907, that the State Assembly passed an act "Empowering Boards of School Directors, Boards of School Controllers, and Central Boards of Education, in school districts of the second and third class to establish and administer a Teachers' Retirement Fund." This act provided "That the Boards of School Directors, Boards or School Controllers, and Central Boards of Education, in school districts of the second and third class, are hereby authorized and empowered to establish and administer a Teachers' Retirement Fund. The said Fund shall consist of all funds available for like purposes at the time of the enactment of this law, together with such additions thereto as the Boards of School Directors, Boards of School Controllers, or Central Boards of Education may, from time to time, prescribe, and such moneys as may be donated or bequeathed for such purposes.

"Section 2. Any teacher, principal, or supervising official, retiring with the consent of the Boards of School Directors, Boards of School Controllers, or Central Boards of Education, shall receive from the said fund such annuity as the Boards of School Directors, Boards of School Controllers or Central Boards of Education may prescribe."

The act of May 18, 1911, which was amended on April 21, 1915, makes further provision that "The Board of School Directors of any district in this Commonwealth, is hereby authorized and empowered to establish, contribute to, and administer as herein provided, a Teachers' Retirement Fund. The said Fund shall consist of all funds available for like purposes in said district at the time of the enactment of this law, together with such additions thereto as the Board of School Directors may, from time to time, appropriate for that purpose from the funds of the district, and such moneys or other property as may be donated, bequeathed, devised, or received from any other source for such purpose.

"Section 2402. The Board of School Directors of any district may provide, in the contracts with its teachers, principals, or supervising officials, that they shall contribute a reasonable sum from their salaries each year to said retirement fund: Provided, That no person shall be required to contribute any part of his salary to any Retirement Fund, unless the same is provided for in the contract by which he is engaged.

"Section 2403. Where the teachers, principals, or supervising official of any district contribute to any retirement fund, they shall be represented in making the regulations governing it, and in its control and management.

"Section 2404. Every teacher, principal, or supervising official who retires in accordance with the regulations prescribed shall be entitled to such annuity as said regulations provide."

Since these laws were passed, only eight cities of the third class have established such funds. Only one of the minor school districts has such a system while of the second class cities, Pittsburgh, since January 1, 1917, has had no Teachers' Retirement Fund in operation. All told, there are at present only eleven cities in Pennsylvania having Teachers' Retirement Systems in force.

"Board of education and teachers are awaiting the making vital of the present State Teachers' Pension Law by adequate appropriation at the coming session of the State Legislature." Prior to January 1, 1917, board of education had a flat pension system with no rules governing it and each case was acted on upon its merits.

A summary of the existing funds now in operation, as found in table No. 69, reveals the following:

The administration of the different retirement funds is generally in the hands of a retirement board consisting of five or seven members. As a rule these boards are controlled by the Board of School Directors and the superintendents of the different schools. The representation of the teachers on these boards usually consists of two or three persons depending whether the board is composed of five or seven members respectively. In Lancaster, however, the seven members of the Board of Directors are elected annually by the teachers from the charter members. The Erie plan, established in 1916—the last one adopted in Pennsylvania—vests the management of the Retirement System in a board of five members, "two members elected by the Retirement Association, the chairmen of the committees on 'finance and property' and 'instruction' of the Board of School Directors and one other elected by these four."

Where the age of retirement is fixed, it is generally between 60 and 65 years. A somewhat lower age period for women is often provided.

Thirty years of service, twenty of which are to be in the local school district, is generally required in order to be eligible for a retirement annuity. The City of Lancaster, however, requires a period of thirty-five years of service, twenty-five of which are to be in the Lancaster schools. On the other hand, in Pittsburgh, only twenty-five years of service were required, while Erie and Altoona make no specification as to the minimum number of years in service necessary for retirement. Scranton and Williamsport require only fifteen years of service in the local schools out of the thirty years of service specified for retirement.

With but one or two exceptions, membership to these funds is compulsory for all teachers.

The income of the retirement funds is in practically all cases derived from three general sources. The contributions of the teachers themselves; appropriations from the different school boards; and whatever is derived from accrued interest, donations, legacies, bequests and so forth. In most systems the teachers' contributions to the funds amount to from 1 to 3 per cent. of their annual salaries. These are usually graded in accordance with the number of years in the service; the contribution being highest for those longest in the service. Erie teachers however, pay as high as 5 per cent. of their annual salary, the minimum being $35 per annum. In Scranton all teachers contribute $15 per year irrespective of service. Teachers in Lancaster and Reading pay straight sums varying from five to fifteen dollars per year in direct proportion to their time in service. Only in the Pittsburgh Teachers' Retirement Fund, which was abandoned early in 1917, did teachers make no contributions whatsoever. In that city, the Board of Education paid a flat pension of five hundred dollars per year after twenty-five years of service.

The appropriations of the different school boards to these retirement funds are usually, "an additional amount equal to at least the amounts contributed by the teachers." A number of school boards also provide an appropriation sufficient to cover the expense of administering these funds.

Before a teacher can retire on an annuity, it is practically everywhere specified that he or she must have made at least twenty-five or thirty annual payments to the fund. When this is not the case, the amount of contributions, still unpaid, is deducted from the annuity.

Six cities provide pension annuities equal to one-half the annual salary at date of retirement. Some cities however, pay straight sums ranging from three hundred dollars to five hundred dollars per year. The pensions of Altoona teachers are computed by taking 2 per cent. of the average pay for the last ten years multiplied by the number of years of service. In Erie there are two classes of members. Class A,—those in the service on or before June 5, 1916; and Class B,—those entering the service after June 5, 1916. A member in Class A, "retiring at age of 60 years or over, shall be entitled to receive from the annuity fund the annuity purchasable by his contributions, with regular interest thereon, together with an equal amount from the pension fund; and if such member shall have served in the public schools not less than fifteen years immediately preceding retirement, or in the case of such a member whose total service in the public schools of Erie is not less than thirty years, at least ten of which shall have immediately preceded retirement, he shall be entitled to receive from the pension fund an additional amount sufficient to make the retirement allowance equal to the annuity that would have accrued if he had made thirty contributions not in excess of $100 each at the rate of 5 per cent. of his average salary for the five years immediately preceding retirement if such sums had been invested annually at 4 per cent. compound interest; if the amount so computed is less than $300, the retiring member shall be entitled to receive from the pension fund an additional amount sufficient to make the total amount $300."

A member in Class B, "retiring at age sixty years or over, shall be entitled to receive from the annuity fund the annuity purchasable by his contributions with regular interest thereon, together with an equal amount from the pension fund."

A minimum and maximum amount of annuities is established in many cases. The lowest minimum is found in Williamsport with $250 per year, while Pittsburgh has the highest with $500 per year. The maximum annuity set, varies from $300 per annum in Reading, to $1,000 in Philadelphia.

In case of mental or physical incapacity partial annuities are generally provided. These are computed by taking as many thirtieths of a full annuity as the number of years of service. A minimum period of service is usually required even for the granting of partial annuities. This latter period varies from five years in most cities to twenty-five years required in Lancaster.

In practically all retirement systems, provision is made for both compulsory and optional retirement age periods. The latter is usually given at the discretion of the Board of School Directors, during the five years preceding the compulsory retirement age, to those having fulfilled the necessary period of service.

Among the cities enumerated in table No. 69, there is only one Teachers' Retirement Fund in Chester. The only retirement secured from that city is that the age for retirement is sixty years and that "there are at present no teachers on pensions. Two receive annual pensions of $357.24, one $359.16 and another one $312.60."

"At the present time," writes the superintendent of schools in Pittsburgh "we have no Teachers' Retirement System in operation in connection with the Pittsburgh Public Schools, but the Board of Education and the Teachers are awaiting the enactment of the proposed State Teachers' Pension Law, which will be introduced at the coming session of the State Legislature."

"Prior to January 1st, 1917, we did have a pension plan whereby teachers who had been in the employ of the Board of Education for at least twenty-five years were eligible to retirement, by the Board, on a flat pension of $500 per year, the Board of Education paying the full amount out of the general school funds."

"No rules were made governing the operation of the above plan. Each case was acted upon on its own merits, and a teacher was permitted to retire only when the Board approved of such retirement, and when retiring the teacher was placed upon our pension pay-roll at the rate of $500 per year, which amount was paid to the teacher in twelve equal installments."

"At the present time we are now carrying on our pension service list, one hundred and five retired teachers to whom we pay $52,500 per year in the aggregate amount."

In Philadelphia, besides the regular retirement fund, there exists also, the Elkin Fund, a private endowment, administered by the Board of Public Education. "Under the provisions of this endowment, as thus administered, unmarried female teachers who have served at least twenty-five years in the public schools of Philadelphia, and who are physically or mentally incapacitated for teaching and whose private income does not exceed four hundred dollars may be retired upon an annuity of four hundred dollars." The rules and regulations of the Retirement Fund also provide that "supplementary annuities which shall not exceed four hundred dollars may at the discretion of the Retirement Board be given to contributors who shall become annuitants under the Elkin Fund; but shall in no case exceed the difference between four hundred dollars and the total private income of the annuitant from any source or sources whatsoever other than the Elkin Fund annuity."

Among the other general characteristics of these funds are the following: Annuities cease upon marriage of an annuitant or on recovery from disability. This usually does not apply to annuitants retired on length of service. It is also generally provided—as is the case with most private pension systems—that in case of insufficient funds, a pro rata reduction in annuities may be established.

There may be little gain in further discussing the merits or demerits of these funds. The success of these retirement systems may be evidenced from the following facts. Since the Act of Assembly of 1907, only twelve cities in Pennsylvania have established systems of retirement funds for their teachers. The one in Pittsburgh was dissolved early in 1917. The superintendent of schools in another city states "that the fund is not sufficient to take care of the whole number of teachers in the city who ought to be receiving pensions." From an actuarial survey made of the Philadelphia Fund, writes an associate superintendent: "It has been found that it will be necessary to revise the provisions of the fund in order to place it upon a sound basis." At a meeting held in October, the teachers' representatives of the Erie Retirement System "spoke in favor of joining the State body as the latter offers several advantages which can never be duplicated by the Erie School District." The efficacy of these funds may also be apparent from the fact that the total number of teachers receiving pensions, in one form or another, during the winter and spring of 1917, did not exceed 624 (including Chester).^{*} The total annual amount expended on these was approximately $284,257.64.

The inadequacy and deficiencies of the systems in operation at present are generally recognized. It is as a result of this recognition that the Legislature, in 1917, established a state wide system of Public School Employees' Retirement Fund.

The provisions of this bill, which becomes operative July 1, 1919, are summarized as follows:† "The act establishes a Retirement System for teachers and other employees of the public school system of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. The system will include:

"1. All 'present employees' who are not members of existing local retirement systems maintained wholly or in

"In addition to this number there were also in 1917, thirty-three teachers in the State receiving pensions from the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching. These pensions are given only to teachers in colleges, universities, technical schools and so forth.

†From a summary by Oliver P. Cornman, Chairman of the Legislative Committee of the State Educational Association.

part from appropriations or public moneys and who elect to become members of the State system prior to July 1, 1919.

"2. All 'present employees' who are members of local systems and who elect through a two-third vote of the membership of the local association with the approval of the local school board to merge the local association with the State system.

"3. All 'new entrants' (i. e., those who enter the service after July 18, 1917) who do not become members of local retirement associations.

II. HOW THE SYSTEM WILL BE MANAGED.

"The management of the system is vested in a Retirement Board, which is assisted by the Board of School Directors by whom the employees are paid.

"1. The Retirement Board is to be constituted as follows: (a) The State Superintendent of Public Instruction; (b) The State Treasurer; (c) One member appointed by the Governor; (d) Three members of the Retirement Association elected from among their number; (e) A seventh member not an employe of the public school nor an officer or employe of the State to be elected by the other six.

"2. The chief duties of the Retirement Board will be: (a) To keep the system actuarially sound; (b) To invest and manage the reserve and savings funds created by the act; (c) To grant retirement allowances as provided by the act.

"3. The chief assistance rendered by the school directors will consist in: (a) Furnishing the Retirement Board with the information and records as required in the act, and (b) Making the deductions from salaries of employees certified by the Retirement Board.

III. HOW THE FUND WILL BE MAINTAINED.

"The funds of the system are to be established upon a reserve basis, the cost being divided between the employes, the State and the school district as follows:

"1. Contributions by the employes. (a) The employes who become members of the Retirement Association will be required to pay a definite percentage of their yearly salary.* This percentage will be determined by their sex and age at the time they begin to make contributions. The rates will vary from slightly more than three per cent. to nearly seven per cent.

"(b) The rates of contribution will be computed by the use of mortality tables, interest tables, and other actuarial data. The initial rate paid by the employe will continue unchanged until retirement unless it should be altered at the time of actuarial revaluation which are provided for in the act.

"(c) The rate of annual contribution for each 'new entrant' must be such that when 62 years of age is attained the reserve accumulated in the individual savings account will be sufficient to purchase approximately one-half the retirement allowance which is provided for the employe by the terms of the act. The cost of that allowance is determined by the average final salary upon which it is based and upon the length of time the annuity will be drawn as shown by the mortality table.

"(d) The rate of contributions of employes who have 'prior service' at the time the act goes into effect must be such that their accumulated savings fund will be sufficient to purchase one-half of the superannuation allowance due on account of future service, and the State and school districts will provide the total retiring allowance due to the prior service.

"(e) Employes whose rates of contributions are over 5 per cent. have the option of reducing the rate to 5 per cent. and receiving at retirement the proportionately smaller annuities that their savings will purchase.

"(f) Employes' contributions are placed in the distinct and separate fund, called the Annuity Savings Fund. Each employe's contributions are placed in his or her individual account and may be withdrawn if the contributor leaves the service without purchasing a retirement allowance.

"2. Contributions by the State and school districts. (a) The State and the school districts will each pay one-quarter of the cost of the superannuation allowance which is dependent upon service rendered after the bill takes effect, and they will each pay one-half the cost of the superannuation allowance dependent upon service rendered prior to the establishment of the retirement system.

"(b) The State and school districts will each pay one-half the cost of that part of the disability allowance which the accumulated deductions of the disabled employe do not provide.

"(c) The contributions of the State and of the school districts will be made in the following way: Contributions for employes in service at the establishment of the fund will be provided for by a series of payments amounting annually to about 5.6 per cent. of the pay roll of those who contribute. This will distribute the accumulation of "State Annuity Reserve Fund No. 2" over about thirty years after which time this contribution will be no longer necessary. In addition there will be provided a certain percentage of the salary of each entrant into the service after the retirement system is established. What that percentage shall be will depend upon the age at entrance. Assuming an average age at entrance of 23 years for the entire service, the contributions thus provided would amount annually to about 1.53 per cent. of the salaries of men entrants and 2.89 per cent. of the salaries of women entrants.

"(d) The contributions of the school district on behalf of those of its employes who become members of the Retirement Association may be made indirectly; the State being authorized to deduct the amount due the retirement systems from the total State appropriation for schools due the local district. The school district, therefore, will not be required to make its contribution from the money raised by local school taxes.

"(e) The State will contribute the administrative expenses of the system.

IV. THE CONDITIONS OF RETIREMENT.

"The benefits accruing to contributors to the system and the age and other conditions of retirement are as follows:

"1. Superannuation benefit. (a) Age for retirement: A superannuation allowance is granted upon the application of a contributor who has attained age 62. Retirement is compulsory at age 70.

"(b) Amount of allowance: The amount of the allowance is equal approximately to 1-80th of the average salary* of the ten years immediately preceding retirement, multiplied by the number of school years the contributor has rendered service in the State. Should the employe where the rate exceeds 5 per cent. elect to reduce his or her contributions to 5 per cent. the amount of the allowance provided by the employe is reduced proportionately. The employe may elect also to take a smaller allowance and provide that it be continued to dependents. Provision is made in the act for other options of equivalent actuarial value.

"2. Disability benefit. (a) Conditions of retirement: A disability allowance is granted to contributors who are found by examination at any time after ten years of service to be physically or mentally incapacitated for duty. Employes drawing disability allowances who are under 62 years of age must submit to periodic examinations to determine whether disabilities have been removed. Those who recover are to re-enter the service or to have their allowances reduced.

"(b) Amount of disability allowance: The amount of the benefit is one-ninetieth of the average salary* of the ten years immediately preceding retirement, multiplied by the number of years of service that the employe has rendered. The minimum allowance is 30 per cent. of final salary except that it must not exceed eight-ninths of the amount of which the employe would have received had he or she remained in service to obtain a superannuation allowance.

"3. Refund Benefit. To contributors who leave the service without a retirement allowance, or to the estate of contributors who died in the service, full return of contributions is made with four per cent. compound interest. Contributors may elect, in lieu of the refund, to have an annuity or deferred annuity of the actuarial equivalent of their accumulated contributions."

This new system, although claimed to be "one of the few in this country founded upon a scientific basis and built up in accordance with the most modern principles of finance and legislation," is criticised by some students with regard to the following: "It is claimed that the allowance, consisting of 1-160th of the final salary for each year of service, is open to objection because the taking of the final salary only as the basis, exposes the system to abuses. It is also argued that the provision that the State shall be reimbursed by the employers of the teachers to the extent of one-half paid by it to meet the future cost of pensions, while primarily intended to interest the local employers in the welfare of the teachers and to distribute the cost is exposed to the danger, that since the State may reimburse itself out of money due to local educational authorities for school purposes, the school expenditures may be crippled to that extent. Students of the question also point out that if the State desires to share the cost in the system it should not have been done at the expense of the schools. The fear is expressed that the burden of the expense may tend to discourage local authorities from raising the salaries of teachers and lead to the employment of only low salaried teachers, and to this extent, negate one of the prime principles embodied in the entire system—the attracting of better ability.

Admitting these shortcomings and imperfections it is evident, however, that any form of a state wide pension system is superior to individual local funds. The teachers everywhere in this State are, from all evidences, heartily in favor of the new system. The popularity of the new act may be seen by the fact that by February, 1919, ten out of the twelve local teachers' retirement funds have merged with the State Fund. The others will probably have joined before this report is out of press. In addition to the local funds, 30,000 individual teachers had made application to join the fund by the same date.

The sentiment of the teachers now in the different local funds may perhaps be judged from the following replies made to our inquiry with reference to the same: The secretary of one school board writes: "Up to date our teachers have taken no action in the matter, but there is a very active committee urging the teachers to endorse the bill and go into the State Fund instead of continuing our present pension fund."

"So far as my own personal opinion is concerned, I would say that there are many points in the State bill that are an advantage over the system that we have and I cannot see how our teachers would be injured in any way by going into the State Fund."

Mr. Oliver P. Cornman of the Philadelphia Public Board of Education writes: "So far as I have been able to learn, the teachers and other school employes heartily endorse the Retirement System and a large majority of the 'present employes' will elect to become members of the Retirement Association. Philadelphia teachers will have to choose between revising their local systems (which will carry with it a considerable increase in the rates of contribution) or merging with the State system. The matter of the State Retirement System has been placed before the 'other employes' of the Philadelphia system and a large portion of them have made application for membership in the Retirement Association."

(4) MUNICIPAL EMPLOYEES' PENSION SYSTEMS.

From the standpoint of the taxpayer the problem of the aged municipal employe is of paramount importance. There can be no greater waste of the taxpayer's money than the retention, in our state and municipal service, of men who have outlived their usefulness. To continue in the employ of our cities at full wages, old men and old women, who are no longer capable of rendering efficient service, is not only a waste of money but in addition has a demoralizing influence upon the entire service. It is also a fact, only too well known, that, because of political influences, our State, County and City governments are burdened with an overwhelming number of superannuated workers who have lost their effectiveness in discharging their duties and who are known to be inefficient.*

The constantly increasing volume of work and the introduction of new methods and higher standards of efficiency into the administration of our municipalities, necessitate the establishment of some process which will relieve the municipalities from the "dead weight" imposed upon them. The establishment of such a system would, in addition, raise the standard and enhance the quality of the service rendered and attract better ability to the particular lines of work.

As employers of labor, however, our cities cannot afford to set the example of discharging outright and turning adrift, or carting off to the poorhouses, employes who have spent the best years of their lives in the service of the municipality. It is pointed out by some students that in the case of policemen and firemen, who are engaged in the most hazardous occupations—in the protection of the life and property of their fellow-citizens—that it is only a matter of justice that the city make some provisions against the day when they are no longer able to provide for themselves, (even as the Nation provides pensions for its soldiers and sailors who hazard their lives in the Nation's defence.) Aside from the justice of the case, however, it is evident that what is recognized as "a good business policy" with private employers ought to prove of profit to our city administrations. The advantages of retiring aged workers on pensions is recognized by all progressive employers of labor. This is evident from the rapid development of these systems, within recent years, as discussed in the preceding pages.

Practically all the leading cities in Europe have had pension systems for their aged employes. In the United States this movement is comparatively recent. It is hardly fifty years old. At the present time, however, every one of the eighteen cities in the United States having more than 300,000 inhabitants, has a pension fund for its policemen and firemen. The six cities with 200,000 to 300,000 inhabitants also pension their policemen and firemen. Nearly all the cities with populations between 100,000 and 200,000 have some form of pensioning one class or another of municipal employes. In addition to these, many of the smaller cities also provide one form or another of pensioning particular groups of their employes.

"The cost and waste of the present method in the city of Boston, as well as the need and scope of a pension plan applied to the municipal service of the city, are indicated by certain returns prepared at the request of the mayor.

"The returns show the following facts regarding the number of pensionable employes, their length of service, compensation and efficiency:

"The total number of employes over 65 years is 491; over 70 years, 168. The amount of compensation paid to employes over 65 is $419,888.45; over 70, $273,000. The number over 65 reported as inefficient is 296. The compensation paid to this group is $200,194.35.

"The percentage of inefficient employes among the employes over 65 years is strikingly large in many departments. For example, in the cleaning and watering division of the street department 35 are employed, of whom all are reported inefficient; in the cemetery department 16 persons over 65 years are employed, of whom all are reported as inefficient; in the park department 27 are employed, of whom 24 are inefficient.

"The period of service is over 30 years in the case of 119 employes over 65, or 25 per cent. of the total. Only 5 per cent. or 42 persons, have been in the employ of the city less than five years.

"The leading departments, in respect to number of pensionable employes, rank as follows: (1) paving division of street department, 109 over 65 years; (2) water department, 65; (3) sanitary division, street department, 58; (4) sewer division, street department, 47; (5) cleaning and watering division, street department, 35; (6) park division, 27; (7) ferry division, street department, 26; (8) cemetery department, 16." At the present time in Pennsylvania, only Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, and Scranton have regular Pension Funds for their policemen. Not one of the third class cities has established such provisions for its aged employes. That there is, however, a strong desire and active agitation for the establishment of such funds is evinced from the replies received to our letters of inquiry addressed to the heads of the Police Bureaus.

"In Erie," writes the Chief of Police, "the police officers have an association known as the Police Relief and Pension Association, which is working to build up a fund to be used for this purpose. We are in hopes the State will do something for the third class cities along these lines in the near future." The Johnstown police "have collected $3,000 playing base-ball to be applied to this fund as soon as we can get council to pass an ordinance creating it." The Chief of Police in Altoona writes: "No effort has been made by the municipal authorities to establish a pension fund in this city and we would be very glad if your department would take the initiative in this matter." Harrisburg reports that it "has not as yet established a pension fund for policemen, but hopes to do so in the near future." In Hazleton, at the time the reply to our inquiry was made, "there was a man from 'The Policemen's News' who was trying to organize the force and to form one, promising to start a fund from the advertising which he will receive for his magazine in writing up the history of the Hazleton Police Department." The Chief of Police of the City of York, expresses his approval of a pension fund, while the head of the Police Department in Wilkes-Barre laments, "With regret, I have to say we have no pension fund nor have we any prospects as yet."

The outstanding features of the three funds now in operation are as follows: The administration of these funds in Philadelphia and Pittsburgh is in the hands of a Board of Directors made up largely of Police District Delegates. In both cities, the city officials are members ex-officio, while in Scranton, the Police Pension Commission is composed of two active members of the Bureau of Police, two persons from the citizens at large and the Director of the Department of Public Safety, who are all appointed by the mayor.

In Philadelphia and Pittsburgh, aside from the members of the police force, it is provided that outsiders may become life members by paying $25. The latter, however, cannot vote and have no right to participate in the benefits.

In Philadelphia, each member contributes to the fund one day's pay per month (not to take into account that part of the salaries in excess of $3,000 per annum). Pittsburgh policemen pay one and one-third per cent. per month of their respective salaries. It is further provided that whenever the surplus of the fund reaches the sum of $50,000 no dues shall be paid. In Scranton, the police pay 1 per cent. of their monthly salaries.

Besides the regular contributions from the members, the funds are supported by city appropriations and whatever is derived from donations, legacies, bequests, etc. The Scranton fund also receives "all money from the sales of unclaimed articles in the possession of the police." Philadelphia's appropriation to its police pension fund for the year 1918, amounted to $60,000. Scranton appropriates "the sum of not less than $2,000 each year and also pays the expenses incurred in the administration of the fund."

Only the regulations of the Philadelphia fund stipulate that a member may retire at the age of 50 after 20 years of service. Pittsburgh and Scranton make no age stipulations, but require respectively, 20 and 30 years of service.

The annuity is computed in Philadelphia, by taking 23 per cent. of the average pay for the last 10 years and multiplying it by the number of years of service. In Pittsburgh and Scranton it is one-half the salary at the time of retirement.

In case of injury or disability received while on duty the fund does not stipulate any definite age or years of service required before the granting of a pension. The same method of computing the annuity is followed here as in the case of the regular one.

The Philadelphia fund also provides for the extension of benefits, in the case of death, to dependent widows and children. Twenty dollars per month is the widow's pension and six dollars per month in addition is paid for each child. The benefits may not exceed fifty dollars per month. The widow's pension is discontinued at remarriage and the child's at the age of fourteen. If both dependent parents are living, an award of twenty dollars per month is given and twelve dollars per month if there is but one living. The Pittsburgh and Scranton funds make no such stipulations.

All existing funds provide for the reduction of the amount of pension in case of insufficient means. In Philadelphia and Pittsburgh, a member when discharged, forfeits all claims and contributions. In Pittsburgh this is the case even upon resigning from the service. Pensions may be revoked in case of misconduct in all city schemes.

From the pension features for firemen as found in table No. 70, it is evident that here again only the first and second class cities in the State have definite provisions for aged firemen. A number of third class cities have firemen Relief Associations, but these pay only sick and death benefits for a limited period.

The chief characteristics of the regular firemen's pension systems in operation at present are the following: The Pittsburgh Fund, although originally established in 1886, did not begin to pay old age or service benefits until after the passage of the "act for the government of cities of the second class" in 1901. This act provided that "The city councils may provide by ordinance a fund for the care, maintenance, relief of aged, retired, disabled or injured policemen or firemen." The Philadelphia Firemen's Pension Fund was chartered in 1891 and the Scranton Fund did not come until 1904.

Only in the Pittsburgh Fund do the firemen have no representation on the Board of Control. In Philadelphia the control is entirely in the hands of the members contributing. But such members of the City Councils as may be named by these bodies are members ex-officio of the Board of Control. Scranton, as is the case in its police fund, provides also for the representation of the citizens at large.

All uniformed and regular members of the fire departments are eligible to membership. In Philadelphia, the members contribute one day's pay each month. When pensioned, a member still continues to pay 50 per cent. of one day's salary at the time of his retirement. Pittsburgh firemen contribute $30 per annum in monthly installments; while in Scranton firemen pay 1 per cent. of their monthly salary.

Other sources of income, which help to maintain these funds are, from appropriations made by the State and City (usually moneys received from taxes on Foreign Fire Insurance Companies), gifts, legacies, bequests, fines and all moneys turned over from previous funds. The Philadelphia Fund in 1918 received an appropriation from City Councils amounting to $25,000. The City of Scranton also provides for the payment of all necessary expenditures of the Commission.

The age when a fireman may retire on a pension is placed in Philadelphia at 45, after 20 years of service. In Pittsburgh, no age is stipulated. Twenty years of service is required, but this need not be continuous. Service credit is also given for time served in the U. S. Army or in the State Militia. The age required for retirement in Scranton is 60 years after 30 years of service. No one under 25 is eligible to service.

The annuity provided in all funds is one-half the salary received at time of retirement. This salary must have been received for a required period of time.

In case of injury or total disability a pension is paid regardless of age or length of service. The Pittsburgh fund provides that a member shall receive full pay when off duty as a result of an injury. This is paid by annual appropriations and not from the fund. In case of total disability $1,000 is paid from the fund.

At the death of a fireman, both Philadelphia and Scranton provide for the extension of benefits to widows and children. The former receive $20 per month and $6 per month is added for each child. The total, however, must not exceed 50 per cent. of salary at time of retirement. These pensions are given only in case a member dies within twelve months after being placed on pay-roll. Widows' pensions cease at remarriage and children's at the age of 16. In case of unmarried members, the Philadelphia Fund also extends benefits to dependent parents. Twelve dollars per month is given to one parent and twenty dollars per month for both.

In addition to the above three cities, Altoona reports that its "firemen have a Relief and Pension Association which pays benefits for sickness, accident, and death, also pensions members after 20 years of active service. The maintenance of same is derived from dues, donations and the City by ordinance turns over the money received from the State from the tax on Foreign Insurance Companies." The City of Johnstown reports: "We have established a pension fund in connection with our Relief Fund. We have over $26,000 in our fund thanks to our many friends in Harrisburg."

A number of cities have their firemen organized in "Firemen's Relief Associations" which pay sick and death benefits. These are usually administered by elected officers from the members. The funds are maintained by contributions from the members (when the service is not voluntary) and by appropriations from the city. The latter is usually the pro rata share received by the city from the State from the tax on Foreign Insurance Companies. The sickness benefits are paid for a certain length of time and in case of death, it is usually provided for the extension of the benefits to dependent widows and children, and if unmarried, to dependent parents.

Practically all the organizations of the latter type are admittedly inadequate and their funds are often insufficient to meet their needs. The chief of the fire department, where one of the best of these systems prevails, writes: "I am of the opinion that the city should keep this money and establish its own pension fund. There should be a service pension paid and as our men get $10 per week from the Association in case of accident and their wages also from the city in some cases extending for several months, you can easily see what a great chance there is for fraud. Our local Association has about $14,000 in its treasury and there is so much wrangling and dissatisfaction that a quorum cannot be obtained at some of the meetings. The pensioning of firemen should be a State affair."

The City of Monongahela "carries on its books what is known as the Special Firemen's Fund which fund was created and is sustained by the city's pro rata share from Foreign Insurance premiums received from the Auditor General out of which we care for sick and disabled firemen who become incapacitated by reason of fighting fire. The City allows for hospital, doctor bills and the amount equal to the daily wage or salary of the sick or injured firemen. We have in the fund at the present time the sum of $5,069.88."

The plight of the cities that have no systems of Firemen Relief and the reactions of those fire chiefs who are eagerly concerned in promoting the best interests of their departments, may be illustrated from the following letters. The chief of the fire department of a city in the western part of the State writes: "We have no pension fund here and are not likely to have one. I have been trying to get our city fathers interested in the Fire Department but they take more interest in the garbage department, street department or any old department. I am ashamed of our equipment. I don't like to see firemen from other cities visit us. They go away laughing. We are way out of date. We have no pension fund and if we ever get it, it will be through Harrisburg and not through our city fathers."

From Oil City the appeal comes: "If you can do anything for us to get one we shall appreciate it very much."

The chief of the fire department of an eastern city, after stating that they have no fund whatsoever adds: "Our fire drivers are not taken care of by any insurance in accordance with the Compensation Act, neither by the city or their respective companies, which I consider they should be. I hope that this information will enlighten you in the matter and compel the right party to provide compensation for them."

Of even greater importance than the question of providing old age pensions for policemen and firemen is the question of providing some form of relief in their old age for the general body of municipal employees. Policemen and firemen are comparatively better paid, than the common laborers and the lower ranks of employes in general, and are therefore, better able to provide for old age. Our municipalities employ many hundreds of workers from the latter groups, who in many cases are paid a lower rate than that paid in the local private industries. These workers, who do the "dirty work," are obviously the group least able to save for old age. That these men who are responsible for the health and the manifold comforts, furnished by our modern cities and who loyally serve the municipality during the best period of their lives, should not be left helpless in their old age is so manifestly a matter of justice that it needs no further emphasis.

Pennsylvania is the leading State in the Union in the establishment of systems for pensioning their municipal employes in their old age. Of the five cities in the country which have established such funds, Pennsylvania has two—Philadelphia and Pittsburgh having such systems at the present time. The only other three cities in the country are New York, Boston and Chicago.

On May 20, 1915, the Legislature passed an act "requiring cities of the first class to establish a pension fund for employes of said cities and all county or other employes, if any, paid by an appropriation of the city councils thereof and out of the treasury of said cities." On the 28th of the same month a similar act "requiring cities of the second class to establish a pension fund for employes of said cities" was passed.

Immediately following the passage of these resolutions both Philadelphia and Pittsburgh established such funds. The former came to existence on August 6, 1915, while the latter was organized on October 4, 1915.

These funds were established in accordance with the provisions of the Legislature and are similar in many respects.

In both cities the pension funds are administered by a Board of Pensions consisting of the mayor, the City Controller and representatives of the City Council. Only the Pittsburgh fund, however, gives representation to the employes; two contributing members are elected to the Board by the contributors.

The beneficiaries in both funds are all salaried and regular employes of the city and county (except those who at the time of the approval of the act are provided for by the already existing pensions). The two pension schemes are still obviously inadequate as both provide that per diem employes—for whom the need of a pension system is even greater—are not required to enter the system unless they so desire. The same exceptions to those already protected by pensions are provided here also.

These funds are made up largely from the contributions of the members—two per cent. of monthly salaries, not to exceed $4 per month. In addition, each city appropriates "a sum sufficient to maintain the pensions or compensations together with such amounts which may be necessary for administering the same."

Before an employe can retire on a municipal pension, it is provided in both funds that he must be at least 60 years of age, and have been at least 20 years in the service.

The amount of the regular pension is 50 per cent. of the average amount of wages received during the last five years but must not exceed $100 per month. In case of injury or disability one may be pensioned regardless of age or length of service in Philadelphia. The Pittsburgh fund, however, requires 20 years of service before one can receive a pension for disability. No benefits are provided for dependents but in case of death, pension may be given to the member's estate.

(5) STATE EMPLOYES' RETIREMENT PROVISIONS.

At the present time there are two classes of State employes who may retire on pensions received from the State after they have fulfilled the specified requirements. These groups are the judges of the Supreme, Superior, Common Pleas, and Orphans' Courts and all "State employes in penitentiaries, reformatories and other institutions operated by the Commonwealth, as well as those more directly in the service thereof."

The former group was first taken care of by an act which was passed in 1901. This act provided "for the removal of judges of the Supreme, Superior, Common Pleas, and Orphans' Court, permanently disqualified by reason of physical or mental disability to perform their judicial functions and duties with half pay for unexpired terms." In 1911 this was amended "so as to allow them full pay during the balance of their terms of office and under certain conditions, half pay during the remainder of their lives."

The amended act provided in addition that "from and after the first day of January, Anno Domini one thousand nine hundred and twelve, whenever the Governor is of opinion, based upon satisfactory medical evidence, that a judge of the Supreme, Superior, Common Pleas or Orphans' Court, is by reason of physical or mental disability, permanently incapacitated for performing his judicial duties, he shall notify said judge of his opinion, giving the reasons therefor; and if the said judge shall resign within thirty days after such notice . . . he shall receive for the balance of the term for which he was elected if he shall so long live, the salary he would have received had he remained in active service.

"Any judge of the Common Pleas or of the Orphans' Court, so resigning, who shall have served continuously in judicial office for twenty-five years or more, immediately prior to the date of his resignation, and shall have reached the age of seventy years, or any judge of the Supreme, or Superior Court, so resigning, who shall have served continuously in judicial office for twenty years or more immediately prior to the date of his resignation . . . shall receive during the remainder of his life, after the expiration of his said term, one-half of the salary which he would have received had he remained in active service.

"Any judge of the Supreme or of the Superior court, who shall have served continuously in judicial office for twenty years or more, and any judge of the Common Pleas or Orphans' Court, who shall have reached the age of seventy years, and who shall have served continuously in judicial office for twenty-five years or more . . . after his honorable retirement from the office by expiration of term, resignation, or otherwise, shall receive during the remainder of his life one-half of the salary which he would have received had he remained in active service."

In 1917 the following changes to this bill were made. It was provided that "Any judge of the Common Pleas or of the Orphans' Court, so resigning, who shall have served continuously in judicial office for twenty years or more, immediately prior to the date of his resignation, and shall have reached the age of seventy-five years, or any judge of the Supreme or Superior court, so resigning, who shall have served in judicial office for twenty years or more, at the date of his resignation . . . shall receive during the remainder of his life, after the expiration of his said term, one-half of the salary which he would have received had he remained in active service.

"Any judge of the Supreme or of the Superior Court, who shall have served in judicial office for twenty years or more, and any judge of the Common Pleas or Orphans' Court, who shall have reached the age of sixty-five years, and who shall have served continuously in judicial office for twenty years or more . . . after his honorable retirement from office by expiration of term, resignation, or otherwise, shall receive during the remainder of his life one-half of the salary which he would have received had he remained in active service."

The revisions made consist in reducing the period of continuous service for judges of the Common Pleas and Orphans' Court from twenty-five years to twenty years. On the other hand, the age when a judge of the lower courts may retire was raised from seventy years to seventy-five years of age. The only change made for judges of the Supreme or Superior Court in case of resignation, was, that formerly the twenty years of service had to be "immediately prior to the date of his resignation." Under the amended plan, it is only required that he "shall have served in judicial office for twenty years or more."

Further modifications made are, that judges of the Supreme and Superior Court, may now also retire at sixty-five instead of seventy years of age, having served twenty years, which need not necessarily be continuous. Judges of the Common Pleas and Orphans' Court may also retire at sixty-five instead of seventy as before, if they have served continuously for twenty years (as compared with twenty-five years previously required) in judicial office.

An act of Assembly passed in 1915 provided that "from and after the first day of September, Anno Domini one thousand nine hundred and fifteen, whenever the Governor is of opinion, based upon satisfactory medical evidence, that a State employe is, by reason of physical or mental disability, permanently incapacitated for performing his regular official duties, except State employes whose retirement has been or shall be otherwise provided for, he shall notify said employe of his opinion, giving the reason therefor; and if the said employe shall resign within thirty days after such notice, and shall have served continuously in office as such a State employe for twenty-five years or more, or who shall have reached the age of seventy years and shall have served continuously in office as such a State employe for twenty years or more . . . he shall receive during the remainder of his life, or during the continuance of such disability or incapacity, one-half of the salary which he would have received had he remained in active service."

This was amended in 1917 so that the twenty-five year period of service necessary for retirement need not be continuous. The age period necessary to qualify for a pension, was also reduced from seventy years to sixty-five years of age.

In the Spring of 1918 there were three judges and nine State employes receiving State pensions.

(6) UNITED STATES PENSIONS.

On June 30, 1917, there were 62,133 Pennsylvanians receiving United States pensions. The total amount spent on these was, $14,867,958.15 per annum.

(7) OLD AGE BENEFITS OF FRATERNAL ORGANIZATIONS.

The earliest forms of mutual assistance and benefits organized by the middle and working classes, were the Fraternal Organizations. These had their beginning in the medieval trade guilds. The industrial revolution, with its resultant hazards, spurred and swelled these organizations tremendously. In England, these developed into the present extensive Friendly Societies and in this country into the numerous Fraternal orders and Secret Societies.

The fraternal organizations supply forms of insurance—largely against sickness, death, and disability—through incorporated associations to their own members, on a co-operative plan. When confronted with the problem of old age relief, these societies, ordinarily, raise only sums sufficient to cover the immediate contingency. This is a system where the younger generations grant aid to the older members with the expectation that in their old age they too will be provided for in a similar manner. The inevitable result is that as the burden of supporting the older members becomes heavier, fewer younger members are attracted into these societies. In addition, many of the latter group drop out, with only the older members holding on until the final collapse. The early history of these societies, as insurance instruments, is strewn with financial wrecks. Few of these societies had adjusted their rates on a scientific basis or with the necessary actuarial data and many soon become insolvent.

At the present time there are approximately 155 fraternal organizations in Pennsylvania. The membership in many of these runs up into the thousands. The Pennsylvania law regulating these organization provides that "it shall be lawful for any corporation, society, or voluntary association now or hereafter formed or organized and carried on for the sole benefit of its members and their beneficiaries, and not for profit, to have and create subordinate lodges with ritualistic form of work and a representative form of government and to issue certificates of membership, make provision for the payment of benefits in case of sickness, disability, or death of its members . . . and in which the payment of death benefits shall be to families, heirs, blood relatives, affianced husband or affianced wife or to persons dependent upon the member." This act, passed in 1893, and never since amended, shows that the payment of old age benefits was not recognized as one of the purposes of beneficiary associations, for which they may be incorporated.

In the Forty-fourth Annual Report of the Pennsylvania Insurance Commissioner, there are listed ninety-five fraternal corporations from other States, doing business in Pennsylvania. There are also listed 59 such Pennsylvania corporations. Of the former, only 9 are listed definitely as giving old age benefits. The number of Pennsylvanians receiving such benefits is thirty-one. The total amount spent on these is $24,420.18. A letter of inquiry addressed to all the Pennsylvania organizations brought thirty-nine responses. None of these pay old age benefits as such. Thirty-two pay no benefits which may be classed as superannuation allowances, although a number pay disability benefits.

The nature and kind of benefits provided, which may be construed and in certain cases may amount to superannuation benefits will be observed from the following letters: The "Fraternal Mystic Circle" reports: "This Society does not pay any old age pensions as such. However, many of our Benefit Certificates or Policies do carry what are known as Old Age Disability Benefits, payable after age 70, and in the event of physical disability that prevents the members from performing at least the major portion of their customary occupation.

"Under some forms of Certificates the Old Age Benefit is the reserve value of the Certificate or Policy, payable in one sum; and in other forms it is one-tenth of the face of the certificate payable annually. There are 4,617 in the entire order which carry an Old Age Benefit at 70 equal to the reserve value of the Certificate, and there are 4,907 in the entire order which provide an Old Age Benefit of one-tenth of the Certificate annually."

The secretary of the Educators' Beneficial Association replies to our inquiry: "We do not have on our records any members to whom we are paying Old Age Benefits. We have a clause in our By-Laws which provides for the payment of $150.00 per year for life, at age 65, if totally disabled through sickness or accident, and after a membership of fifteen years."

The United States Annuity Society has "just one aged person drawing benefits from the society. His age is 72. We pay him a monthly income of $25 which is to be paid as long as he lives." The Supreme Secretary of the Protective Home Circle writes: "Our Order only pays old age disability, beginning at age seventy. We pay one-twentieth of the face of their benefit certificate each year for ten years.

"Our certificates run in multiples of $500.00—from $500.00 to $3,000.00 so that on a $500.00 certificate there would only be $25.00 a year. On $3,000 certificate, there would be $150.00 a year.

"This is not a matter of charity, however, but simply an old age benefit, as per law."

The Independent Order of Puritans reports the following plan used by the organization. "This Order issues a Monthly Income Certificate that provides a monthly benefit to the family or other beneficiary in the event of the death of the member. To illustrate, the member carries a $5,000 Certificate, in the event of his death, the Order pays to his beneficiary $50.00 each month for a period of one hundred months, being eight and one-third years.

"On reaching age 70, the member can file a claim for old age disability and receive $50.00 a month until the amount of his Certificate is paid, in the event of death any unpaid portion of the Certificate is paid to the beneficiary." At present the Order is paying old age benefits to five persons.

The foregoing analysis shows that only a negligible number of these associations have old age benefits—in most cases, merely extensions of the sickness insurance systems—and the number receiving such benefits in Pennsylvania is inconsiderable. Fraternal orders and societies provide mainly for sickness, accident, death, and invalidity. While a number provide for prolonged and permanent disability allowances, which in advanced years may amount to a pension, the number actually giving old age benefits is insignificant.

(8) TRADE UNION SUPERANNUATION BENEFITS.

Mr. Samuel Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labor, states in a letter addressed to the "Committee on Miners' Home and Pensions," "The general purpose—that the organization ought to take care of its aged and indigent members, and to make some provision for their welfare and protection—is a most worthy one. It is in accord with the general fraternal concept that underlies the whole organized labor movement. It has much in common with the more sensitive social conscience that has led to general provisions for those in want."

He farther warns that "Many of the proposals for social insurance are of a compulsory nature. Wage earners now find themselves confronted by this alternative: either labor organizations must make more comprehensive and more adequate provision for trade union benefits, or else they will have forced upon them, compulsory social insurance under the control and the direction of governmental agencies. Compulsory social insurance will inevitably result in supervision by the Government of the normal activities of trade unions and in the delegation to governmental agents of all matters that vitally affect the interests, the rights, the welfare and the freedom of wage-earners."

It is also the general conviction of trade unionists, that a pension paid by the union to its old members is of inestimable value. Trade union experience, with established benefit features, has proved these to be sources of strength, "holding and binding the membership together in a bond of human sympathy, winning the admiration and respect of even those who are opposed to union organizations." As an organizing factor, it is invaluable. It attracts, and prompts to identify themselves with labor organizations, members who would perhaps otherwise remain on the outside and be a constant menace. The fact that a member is rewarded for loyalty to the union by being provided for in his declining years not only sponsors more prompt payment of dues, but reduces the lapses of dues to a minimum. Furthermore, it causes many to consider well before contemplating the severing of their connection with the union for any but very serious reasons.

It would appear from the preceding that among trade unions at least—where the principle of fraternal brotherhood is most firmly established—there would be found complete measures and comprehensive schemes for the protection of their loyal members in their declining days. This however, is not the case; and thus far, the American labor movement has done comparatively little in the way of providing opportunity for protection against old age.

The 1908 Report of the United States Commissioner of Labor, lists 18 Trade Union organizations as paying benefits for temporary disability, and death. Four of these pay benefits for temporary disability, permanent disability and death; three pay benefits for temporary disability, permanent disability, death and superannuation; two pay benefits for temporary disability, permanent disability, death, superannuation and death of members' wives. Of the 83 unions that pay death benefits, 18 pay permanent disability benefits. Only four were paying superannuation benefits. Four other unions were at that time accumulating a fund for the payment of superannuation benefits which are now in operation.

The first American Trade Union to institute an old age pension system was the International Typographical Union. The history of the pension system of this labor organization is interesting and indicative of the whole problem of fraternal insurance. This union, which began to take care of its aged workers as early as 1892, has ever since been in the vanguard of the movement to extend old age pensions to all groups. In 1894 the International Typographical Union opened its Union Printers' Home at Colorado Springs, Colorado, in order to take care of the old and infirm members, "who through their steadfast loyalty and many sacrifices to the I. T. U. have made the present organization possible." After several years of experience with this Home—generally conceded a good Home—the I. T. U. soon became aware of the fact that many aged and incapacitated members were unable to avail themselves of the benefits of the home because of family ties and long associations in their respective communities. Once this was realized, to further insure the members against abject poverty and public or private charity, an old age pension system was established at the annual convention of the Union in 1907. This became operative in March 1908.

The law, as originally adopted, provided for the payment of $4.00 per week to members 60 years of age, having a continuous active membership in good standing of twenty years, unable to obtain sustaining employment at the printing trade, and not earning more than $4.00 per week at the trade. At the 1910 Convention the law was amended so as to render eligible to pension, members 70 years of age, having a continuous active membership in good standing of ten years. Provision was also made in the law for members totally incapacitated for work whose applications for admission to the Home had been disapproved by reason of their affliction; such members to have twenty years continuous active membership in good standing.

In 1911, at its convention in San Francisco, the I. T. U., finding that the preceding amendment still did not reach a large number of men whom it was necessary to assist and also that the experience of the first few years of its pension fund warranted a further extension of the benefits, increased the pension allowance to five dollars per week to the following three classes of members.

First. Members 60 years of age who have been members in good standing for a period of twenty years, including and antedating the enactment of the pension law, and who find it impossible to secure sustaining employment at the trade. Applicants under this provision of the law must have been members in good standing at the time the pension law became effective and maintained active membership since that time.

Second. Members who have reached the age of 70 years and who have been in continuous good standing for a period of ten years and who find it impossible to secure sustaining employment at the trade.

Third. Members who are totally incapacitated for work, who have been continuous active members for twenty years, and whose applications for admission to the Home have been disapproved because their afflictions are such as to render them ineligible for entry to that institution.

The fund for the payment of pensions is provided by a tax of one-half of one per cent. of the weekly earnings of all members.

Since March 1908, when the assessments were first made, the total receipts of this fund up to May 31, 1917, were $2,513,205.21 from the tax assessment, $128,059.72 was derived from interest, and $653.50 from returned pensions. The total receipts were $2,641,918.43. The expenditures made during the same time were $1,975,859.00 paid to pensioners; and $50,183.70 for administration and registered system. The balance of the fund on May 31, 1917 was $615,875.73.

The table below shows what it cost per member to maintain this fund since its establishment.

Year	Total Earnings of Members	Monthly Pension Assessment Per Member
1909	$40,293,738	37.3 cents
1910	45,602,944	39.7 cents
1911	49,770,668	40.5 cents
1912	53,378,902	41.3 cents
1913	56,944,484	42.5 cents
1914	61,050,332	43.0 cents
1915	61,155,285	43.5 cents
1916	62,711,805	43.3 cents
1917	66,652,431	45.2 cents

It will be observed that with one exception the assessments have continually increased. During the first few years, the financial operation of the system was declared eminently satisfactory. A comparison, therefore, of the receipts and expenditures of this fund during the first few years and the last years is exceedingly enlightening. In the first year the receipts exceeded the amount expected, while the expenditures were even less than those estimated. Because of this, there was a temptation to reduce the amount of assessment. After several years of experience, however, it appears that the expenditures on pensions have grown steadily, and in 1917 have amounted to nearly $20,000 more than the receipts from the assessments. Indeed, while at the end of the first year the balance in the fund, after paying out all expenditures, was $159,767.17, in 1917, there was an actual deficit of $425.15. This deficit is even larger when the $23,282.75 interest item is deducted from the total receipts. At the last convention of the I. T. U. a warning was sounded because of this and it was recommended that "the provision in the pension law which permits a member of but ten years' standing to be placed on the pension roll at the age of 70 should be repealed. When this amendment was adopted there was some justification for the law. That justification has ceased to exist, and it is not fair that those of our members who join the union at the age of 21 or thereabouts should be assessed to pay pensions to members who join at the age of 55 or later. It is a question whether members who work regularly two days each week are legally entitled to continue on the pension roll. We may as well realize the fact that if we are to continue this extremely liberal interpretation of our pension law we must pay for it by an increased assessment."

Up to May 31, 1917, 2,590 applications for pensions by the I. T. U. were received. Of this number 72 petitions were disapproved, 51 were withdrawn and 2,467 were approved. Death removed 958, leaving 1,509 pensioners on May 31, 1917. The high death rate of 36.9 per cent. among these pensioners is significant. This is doubtless due to the advanced ages of the pensioners. Only 110 of these living are under 60 years of age. The membership of the unions having members on pension in 1917 was 49,766. The pensioners represented 3 per cent. of the membership of these unions which in return constituted over three-fourth of the total membership of the I. T. U. During the fiscal year ending May 31, 1917, 69 pensioners were added.

The Order of Railroad Telegraphers has established a pension fund for life annuities to old and faithful members of the order who have reached an advanced age in life, as well as to those totally disabled through physical and mental infirmities. In order to be eligible to membership, one must be a member continuously for at least five years, immediately prior to the filing of application for membership with the pension fund. Members 60 years of age and over are not eligible to membership in the pension fund after January 1, 1916.

The fund is maintained from an admission fee of five dollars from all applicants for membership in the pension fund and from a semi-annual assessment thereafter "equal to an equal division of $240 over the period ensuing between the age of the applicant at the time of admission to the pension fund and his 65th birthday after which his or her assessments shall cease."

When a member of the pension fund attains the age of 65, he is paid a monthly salary of $20 during the balance of his or her natural life.

In order to obtain a total disability pension, eight years membership is required. The assessments cease as soon as placed on retirement roll.

The pension fund is entirely self sustaining and can in no way create any financial liability to the order of the Railroad Telegraphers.

The Secretary and Treasurer of the Order writes: "We will probably discontinue our pension plan at our next convention, which will be held during the month of May, 1919, due to the fact that this proposition has not received the support of our members as was anticipated. If it is discontinued, all money paid into the fund will be returned to the members of this department."

The Bricklayers, Masons, and Plasterers' International Union of America has an Old Age, Disability and Widows' Relief Fund. This union provides, that when a member has been in continuous good standing for a period of twenty or more years, and has passed the age of sixty and who through some bodily infirmity is unable to secure sustaining employment at any occupation and has no means of support, he is then entitled to make application and receive $5 per week benefits from the Relief Fund.

A member who meets with some accident while working at his trade on a building, during working hours, and is incapacitated from work, and who has ten years of continuous standing to his credit, is entitled to disability relief, of $5 per week.

The widow of a member, entitled to old age or disability relief, who is without means of support and who has reached the age of sixty years at the time of her husband's death, is entitled to the $5 weekly payment until she dies or remarries.

It is provided by the by-laws, that each member shall pay to the International Union Treasury such relief dues as may from time to time be levied by the International Union in convention assembled. The present assessment to the fund is 50 cents a month for each member.

This union has jurisdiction over the U. S. and Canada. In October 1918, it had 1,374 old age beneficiaries; 109 were receiving disability benefits and 167 widows were on pension. Each of these was drawing $5 per week as a pension. In Pennsylvania this Union has 101 persons receiving old age benefits, 15 are receiving disability benefits and 16 widows are receiving pensions, making a total of 132 pensioners. In this State each one of these is receiving $5 per week or $260 per year, making a total of $34,320 per year.

The Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen reports of "an insurance feature in which every member must participate if he is able to pass the required medical examination," but "has no Old Age Relief Fund."

The Order of Railway Conductors of America, reports of twenty-one Pennsylvanians receiving assistance from their Relief Fund. The average amount received by these a month is $25.00. The secretary further adds: "All members of our Order are eligible to participate and receive assistance from this Fund, provided they are totally disabled and without means of support for themselves and families."

It is interesting to notice that the organizations which have established pension systems of late, have learned somewhat from the experience of their predecessors and are at least attempting to adjust their rates on a more actuarial basis; and in addition provide many safeguards for the stability of their funds.

The Pension Association of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers was first authorized in 1912 and was revised and readopted May 22, 1918. Its constitution provides that after the passage of this law, no one 60 years of age and over shall be admitted to membership. On and after June 30, 1916, no application shall be received for membership to the Pension Association from those who have reached the age of 50 years. And on and after December 31, 1919, no one can join who has reached the age of 45 years, while after December 31, 1920, members who have reached the age of 40 years are barred from membership. It is also provided that only such members of the B. of L. E. who are earning at least $60 per month are eligible to membership in this association; also "no person who is out of employment temporarily caused by sickness or injury, can become a member of this Association during such period." In addition to these restrictions, "All applicants for membership in this Association will be required to pass a physical examination by a competent and reliable physician, and those having known physical or mental defects may become members of this Association, provided that proper and legal waivers be furnished by such applicants exempting this Association from any and all liabilities resulting therefrom."

Benefits are extended to the following: First, "Any member of this Association in good standing, who was in active service at the time of enrollment as a member, but who from physical or mental cause is totally and permanently disqualified, or has been retired on account of old age, shall receive from the funds of this Association a monthly pension as hereinafter provided.

"Any member of this Association who voluntarily retires from active service will not be entitled to receive a pension on account of old age until he has reached the age of 65 years."

Second: "Any member of this Association, in good standing, who was not in active service at the time of enrollment as a member of this Association, who from physical, mental, or other cause, is unable to perform any kind of remunerative employment, or who has reached the age of 70 years, shall receive from the funds of this Association a pension as hereinafter provided; provided further, however, that no member shall receive a pension for disability caused by his use of intoxicants, or unlawful acts."

Third: "All members of this Association, who are 65 years of age and are in active service, may if they so elect, voluntarily retire permanently from such service, and thereupon become eligible to a pension at once. All other members who have reached the age of 70 years shall be granted a pension."

The contributions and the pensions of this Association are graded and vary in accordance with the age and period of contribution. The amount of dues paid by each member follows:

"All active members under the age of 30 years shall pay 50 cents per month.

All active members from the age of 30 to 35 years shall pay $1.00 per month.

All active members from the age of 35 to 40 years shall pay $1.50 per month.

All active members from the age of 40 to 45 years shall pay $2.00 per month.

All active members from the age of 45 to 50 years shall pay $2.50 per month.

All active members from the age of 50 to 55 years shall pay $3.00 per month.

All active members from the age of 55 to 60 years shall pay $3.50 per month.

All active members from the age of 60 to 65 years shall pay $4.00 per month.

All active members over the age of 65 years shall pay $4.50 per month."

The pensions allowed are based upon the following scales: "Any member of this Association who has been declared a pensioner by the Board of Governors, who shall have paid dues for 60 months, or less, shall receive a pension from this Association for the remainder of his life, of $25.00 per month."

"Those paying the dues for 61 months to 120 months, $30.00 per month.

Those paying the dues for 121 months to 180 months, $35.00 per month.

Those paying the dues for 181 months to 240 months, $40.00 per month.

Those paying the dues for 241 months to 300 months, $45.00 per month.

Those paying the dues for 301 months to 360 months, $50.00 per month.

Those paying the dues for 361 months to 420 months, $55.00 per month.

Those paying the dues for 421 months to 480 months, $60.00 per month.

Those paying the dues for over 480 months, $65.00 per month."

The Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers also has an Indigent Fund and an Insurance Relief Fund. No information is available as to the number of pensioners in Pennsylvania.

The Pressman's Union adopted a pension plan, by first creating a sinking fund from the accumulations of a 25 cent assessment per month for all members for five years, before the payment of pensions became operative. This, it is believed, will create a sufficient fund which when placed on interest will insure stability and prevent the gradual increase of the per capita tax as was the case with other established funds.

Since 1913, District Number 21, United Mine Workers of America has had the following pension system:

Each member pays 40 cents assessment per month, which may be raised or lowered when necessary.

All members, 60 years of age, when they have discontinued work in the mines, or those physically disabled from performing further labor in and around the mines, having no other means of support, and in good standing for five years preceding January 1st, 1913, shall receive $3.00 per week. Those joining the Union after January 1st, 1913, are not eligible to benefits unless they have been members in good standing for 5 years prior to making application for pension.

At the 1916 International Convention of the United Mine Workers of America, a Committee was appointed "to investigate and report the advisability and possible cost, to the International Union, of erecting and maintaining a suitable home wherein to care for the aged, infirm and decrepit members."

After a careful investigation of the Soldiers' Homes, and Homes for the Aged maintained by the different unions, and fraternal organizations, in the United States and England, the Committee reached the conclusion that "taking the estimates of other homes, it would cost about $43.30 per month for each resident for clothing, food, medical attendance, and medical supplies."

The Committee, further reports that "The question of pension, with or without a home, was early called to our attention, and as the different organizations with whom we came in contact either had pension systems in active operation or were preparing to adopt pension systems, we deemed it advisable to gather all the data possible on that subject." In comparing the safeguards adopted by other organizations, and in its "endeavors" to select the best that are actually necessary, to make the plan a success, the committee at the last International Convention of the U. M. W. A., recommended the following plans for creating and maintaining a pension system.

"(1) An old age disability pension fund is hereby created by an assessment of 40 cents per month per member, which shall automatically be raised and lowered as necessary under the direction of the board of trustees herein-after provided for, but in no case shall the assessment exceed 50 cents per month per member.

"(2) Said assessment shall be in full force and operation on and after April 1, 1918.

"(3) A sinking fund shall be created by the accumulation of said assessment for a period of three years from and after April 1, 1918.

"(4) That on and after April 1, 1921, all members in good standing who have reached the age of sixty-five years and who have been continuous members in good standing for a period of ten years immediately preceding their application for pension and have paid their regular monthly assessment to the pension fund for at least three years, whose earning capacities have been reduced to less than twenty-five dollars per month, and who have no visible means of support other than their labor, shall be eligible to receive a pension of twenty dollars per month, payable monthly.

"(5) That on and after April 1, 1921, any member who has been a continuous member in good standing for ten years immediately preceding his application for pension and who has paid his regular monthly assessment to the pension fund for at least three years and who is totally incapacitated for work by reason of accident or sickness of a permanent character, who has no visible means of support other than his labor and who has been denied aid from compensation laws or has tried and failed to recover reasonable damages for injuries sustained, shall, upon satisfactory proof, be allowed a pension of twenty dollars per month, payable monthly; the trustees to have the right to appoint a physician or physicians to make an examination if they deem it necessary."

From a canvass of 600 locals with a total membership of 120,568 the Committee has learned that there were 4,199 members from 60 to 65 years old; 1,928 from 65 to 70 years of age, and 156 from 70 and over. In addition there were also, 1,497 members incapacitated under 60 years of age.

The Committee admits that this is a very large per cent., as compared with the membership of other organizations, but recommends the adoption of 65 years of age as the minimum age for the payment of pensions.

The Committee accepts the experience of the International Typographical Union as a safe guide for their own contemplated plan. It states that in the latter Union, there is a fraction more than 22 pensioners to each 1,000 members, which they assume will hold true of their own membership. They ignore however, the fact that the percentage of pensioners in the I. T. U. has been continuously on the increase. And further ignore the definite warning, of the Union Executive Committee, sounded at the last convention, that while the expenditures on pensions have continuously increased, the receipts did not increase to the same extent. And for the last fiscal year there was even a deficit.

The experience of, even the firmly established and best intentioned fraternal pension systems in this country has not proved these to be very satisfactory insurance instruments. It is, doubtless, this recognition that has prompted the International Typographical Union to adopt the following resolution at its 1917 Convention.

"Whereas, The United States of America is the only great nation in the world (excepting Russia) that does not provide old age pensions for its worn out and worthy workers; and,

"Whereas, The consequent necessity of American workers to provide their own benefits is a gross injustice, and frequently ends in failure through no fault of the workers; and,

"Whereas, The Government of the United States of America has demanded that its citizens protect the honor of the nation with their lives in a great war, while this Government has not in the past been responsive to the demands of its workers to protect their honor; therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the International Typographical Union, in convention assembled, endorse and urge the passage of the old age pension bill introduced in Congress by Geo. I. R. Sherwood, for the benefit of all American workers."

That attempts, made by the working classes to provide against old age frequently end in failure, is certainly well borne out and generally recognized. Labor organizations and labor leaders have therefore been most active in agitating for governmental pension systems in old age. Knowing the difficulties confronting them in establishing their own provisions, labor unions have repeatedly declared that "The responsibility of caring for the veterans of industry who in times of peace have been the mainspring in the work of material progress, and in times of war have always been ready to sacrifice their all, either in the field of active operations or in bearing the burdens of taxation and support, should as a matter of right and justice rest upon the Government."

In Pennsylvania, for the last decade, the State Federation of Labor has been the most active body urging a state-wide pension plan for all aged workers. A bill for this purpose was introduced by the Chairman of this Commission, in the 1917 session of the Legislature.

CHAPTER III.

THE PROBLEM OF OLD AGE PENSIONS—WHAT IT IS.

"In the care of the aged we express our altruism in its highest form."* The question of state pensions for the aged, like all social problems, is of modern origin. As a form of social insurance it is not necessarily preventive of poverty but rather remedial. Nevertheless, in its most liberal form it seeks to accomplish a more equitable distribution of wealth. A state old age pension ultimately involves a redistribution of wealth, either from the productive years of the individual to his non-productive years, or from the funds of the entire community to the aged. The question of providing for the aged hardly existed before the era of the factory system. The modern problem of old age is a result of tremendous industrialization of production since the industrial revolution. In the primitive patriarchal state old age was revered, and the aged person was looked up to for advice. Where the family was a unit the supremacy of the old was permanent and continued beyond their productive powers. The worker in medieval times ordinarily would go on working as long as he could produce something. The feudal lord was obliged to take care of his workers in case of sickness, accident and old age. Under those conditions there was no necessity for individual provisions against any emergency. In the early stage of industrial development, the economic relations between men were more or less of a permanent character. The labor contract was usually life-long. The usefulness of an old man or woman also rarely ceased in an agricultural society before actual senility had taken place.

All this is changed under our modern wage system. The rapid development of industry has deprived old age of the esteem bestowed upon it under the more primitive patriarchal conditions. Modern industry at the end of a life productive toil relegates its aged and decrepit workers to the scrap heap as useless and of no economic value. "It is notorious that the insatiable factory wears out its workers with great rapidity. As it scrapes machinery so it scrapes human beings. The young, the vigorous, the adaptable, the supple of limb, the alert of mind, are in demand. In business and in the professions maturity of judgment and ripened experience offset, to some extent, the disadvantage of old age; but in the factory and on the railway, with spade and pick, at the spindle, at the steel converters there are no offsets. Middle age is old age, and the worn-out worker, if he has no children and if he has no savings, becomes an item in the aggregate of the unemployed. The veteran of industry who is crowded out by changes in processes and the use of new machinery is obviously an instance of maladjustment." It was seen from our discussions that many industrial concerns—especially railroads—will not employ men after they have reached the age of 40, and a few bar men from employment even at the age of 35. It was also found that but few aged workers were engaged in the leading Pennsylvania industries. The labor contract in the factory system is made only for a temporary period, and the employer recognizes no obligation to support the workers during their declining years of inactivity. The aged worker is thrown upon his own resources. This condition of impotence is augmented still further by the break-up of the family in modern society which often thrusts the aged worker into a strange country or community without friends or relatives. "After the age of sixty has been reached, the transition from non-dependence to dependence is an easy stage—property gone, friends passed away or removed, relatives become few, ambition collapsed, only a few short years left to live, with death a final and welcome end to ail—such conclusions inevitably sweep the wage-earner from the class of hopeful independent citizens into that of the helpless poor." The modern problem of old age is thus obviously the problem of the inability to find employment combined with waning earning power. The old man now finds it difficult to secure work even at low wages.

It is evident that much of old age poverty is a result of conditions or misfortunes over which the individual has no control. Many of the aged poor must not be looked upon as paupers. They are the "picked survivors of our civilization," and only created paupers by the industrial conditions. It sounds contradictory, but the effect of the blessings of civilization and the prolongation of life is only to prolong the period of inactivity and, because of the growing complications of industry, the working period is also shortened. "There are approximately 1,250,000 former wage-earners who have reached the age of sixty-five years in want and are now supported by charity, public and private. In round numbers, it is costing this country $220,000,000 a year for the support of this great host of worn-out toilers."† An estimate of the extent of aged dependency in Pennsylvania may be obtained from the figures presented in other parts of the Report. Students of social and economic conditions and of standards of living are generally agreed that with the modern cost of living, the great masses of workers cannot lay aside from current wages sufficient to provide for possible emergencies. The excessive expenditures required on food and rent as disclosed in the house-to-house studies bear out this contention. Saving for old age is especially difficult as it is so remote and uncertain of attainment. Most people have a working belief in the power of kind fate to bring release in one form or another, before the tools have to be dropped. Professor Seager aptly states: "The conditions of modern industry have failed to supply motive for saving sufficiently strong to take the place of those that are gone. It is true that saving is still necessary to provide for the rainy day, for loss of earning power due to illness or accident or old age, but against these needs is the insistent demand of the present for better food, for better living conditions, for educational opportunities for children. This demand is not fixed and stationary. It is always expanding. . . . One consequence of our living together in cities and daily observing the habits of the better off than we are is that we are under constant pressure to advance our standards. This pressure effects the wage-earner quite as much as it does the college professor. Both, when confronted with the problem of supporting a family in a modern city, find the cost of living as Mark Twain has said, 'a little more than you've got.'‡"

Professor Miller, in the most recent book on Social Insurance, concludes: "Thrift is a desirable habit for those who receive a wage that makes saving a possibility, but thrift becomes a mockery in the homes of the poor, and saving an economic falsehood."‡

It is evident that the problem of economic support of the aged is with us, and whether met in one form or another, society bears the burden. The giving of alms, however, either private or public, is not only insufficient and unsatisfactory, but as has been pointed out by many students before, it exercises a degrading effect upon the recipient and is repugnant to the self-respecting person. "While the social activities of the state are marked by humane legislation in many forms, for the betterment of the individual, its system of poor relief is antiquated. Poor relief makes no distinction between the worthy and the unworthy; the social stigma, the deprivation of citizenship and often the publication in the town report of the name of the recipient and the amount doled out to him, make the system onerous and the opprobrious epithet of 'pauper' is the price the citizen pays for help.§§ It is also evident that the retention of an aged employe in active service often involves economic waste.

To meet the problem adequately, systems of old age pensions or insurance are, therefore, urged, not only as a means of taking the aged workers out of the poorhouse and enabling them to spend their last years in self-respect and comfort but for many other reasons. "Social insurance has a significant effect on the national health and physique," says Frank A. Vanderlip, President of the National City Bank. It is contended that any system of insurance is preferable to individual savings. Insurance is defined as an arrangement by which the losses sustained by few are distributed among many. The individual savings against old age from this view point may be considered even uneconomic as it requires every person to provide by a lifetime of painful effort, with no absolute security, against a contingency which is certain to be experienced only by a few who survive. Moreover, it is argued by many students that "Wages ought to mean an income sufficient to insure support for life; and where such is not the case it is inevitable that supplementary means shall be forthcoming in old age to warrant a continued 'living.' Under such conditions public support should be considered as postponed wages, and not charity. The worker who has spent his life in industry, and whose wages have been legitimately consumed in support of himself and family, is entitled to 'supplementary' wages in old age. A pension in such cases may rightly be called 'postponed wages.'"

*The matter of the aged was settled summarily by primitive men. It is told that some savage tribes used to put their old gentlemen up in trees, and then after singing "the fruit is ripe" shook the trees, and clubbed the aged unfortunates as they tumbled down.

Secretary of War, Newton D. Baker, in his annual report for 1917, speaking of a retirement law for Government employees said: "The effect of such a law would be to give an assurance of a competent and comfortable old age. It would relieve the employee from the fear of loss of occupation and of livelihood, would further inspire him to loyalty to the Government as an employer, thus improving the general quality of the service rendered by Government employees, and would permit the replacement of some employees in the various departments who have long and faithfully served the Government and reached venerable but enfeebled years without having had an opportunity to accumulate any competence upon which their retirement can rest." Secretary of Commerce Redfield, in his annual report for the same year said: "Efficient service and justice to employees demand a comprehensive, wide-reaching, and effective scheme of retirement pensions, the advantages of which are being more and more widely recognized by progressive commercial establishments and by foreign governments." The Chief Clerk of the Department of State said: "Most men look forward with more or less apprehension to the impairments of advancing years, and such apprehension unconsciously affects adversely their ability for the complete performance of duties assigned to them. I believe that a reasonable assurance of being cared for in his declining years will proportionately increase a man's mental and physical effectiveness in his years of health and vigor."†

Secretary of Labor, William B. Wilson, in speaking of old age pensions said: "During his entire lifetime the propertyless workman must continue to give a share of what he produces in the form of profits to his employer in return for the opportunity of earning a living. The compensation received seldom exceeds the household requirements, 'economically administered.' When the time comes that the physical and mental faculties begin to decline, when his powers of brain and brawn can no longer be profitably employed, no means have been accumulated by him with which to sustain existence. Surely, then, society at large, to which he has given a lifetime of labor, which protects his employer and others in their title to property, should protect him in his right and title to a comfortable existence during the remainder of his days."

"The State at the present time recognizes a part of its duty to the old, the sick, the injured and the incompetent, as is shown by the establishment of poorhouses and hospitals. But our poorhouses are organized and maintained on the principle of charity, rather than on obligation which society owes to its superannuated workers. The application of the principles of charity in that case is unjust. Society, in carrying out its own ideas of economic law, has left them, after a lifetime of hard labor completely stranded, like ship-wrecked mariners on the arctic shore of time. It owes them a living, and should pay its debts."‡

In his inaugural address to the members of the Massachusetts Legislature of 1917, Governor Samuel W. McCall, recommended the adoption of a system of old age pensions which should be regarded strictly as a pension "granted in recognition of long and meritorious service to society." In answer to the objection that a pension would discourage thrift, Governor McCall states: "That the members of the groups to which it would practically be applicable, work for wages which would not permit of saving upon any sufficient scale and with little to save they would have little to squander." The New England Governor speaks of the need of old age pensions as a direct creation of modern machine industry which because of its speed and strain has no place for many workers who are unable to maintain the pace much beyond their prime of life. The problem as stated by him is that, "It does not necessarily mean that they are worn out, but they cannot keep up with the demands of the modern methods of production, and thus they are thrown out of their accustomed work at a period of life and under circumstances when it is difficult, if not impossible, for them to acquire efficiency in a new calling. If they have not made provision before that time arrives they are likely to become dependent."

"Strictly, a wage should be paid during the period in which one is ordinarily able to work in such employments which would support him for his whole life. Thirty years of labor with the fast-flying machinery of our manufacturing establishments will enable the workingman to produce more than with the appliances just before our era he could have produced in many centuries. It is not economically just to credit to machinery the whole saving in production and leave the man a derelict at the end of his working time. There should be charged against it the damage done him as a producing agency as an element in the cost of production. If that element were not to be fairly represented in wages or in some other way we should have a deformed industrial system, which would absorb the vital forces of millions of men and then heartlessly cast them off with no hope of living out their days, except through the charity of their fellow men. It would be just to assess against production the cost of providing for the care of the worker during the period after his invalidity should come. Either that or the wage should be adjusted so that in ordinary cases it would enable the worker to make provision for himself."

The adequacy of the means existing in Pennsylvania to meet the problems of the superannuated workers, who often through no fault of their own, are forced to become dependent was seen from the discussions in the preceding chapters. An examination of the tables revealed that of all the multifarious forms of industrial, municipal, and fraternal pensions in the State the number of Pennsylvania wage-earners actually on pension lists in 1913 hardly reached ten thousand. In the seventeen leading industries listed, the number of former Pennsylvania employees actually receiving old age pensions was 2,152. The number of wage-workers receiving pensions from concerns having no regular pension system would hardly exceed an additional five hundred. Of all the railroad workers in the State only about four thousand aged employees are receiving old age support. Tables 14 and 58 are significant at this point. However, even if these systems were operated more extensively, it is clear that they are largely dependent upon the arbitrariness of the employer, which makes the receipt of a pension very uncertain for many employees. The period of service required is often too long. These schemes, it was apparent, discriminate unfairly against those who cease to be employees. In a few cases in the contributory schemes, employees either do not have their contributions returned or have them returned without interest. Generally industrial pensions are considered merely deferred wages. These industrial systems specify that a pension may be terminated at any time; that the establishment of such a system is not to be construed as conferring an contractual right, and that the company reserves the right to discharge an employee or terminate the system at any time. It is also pointed out by many students of the problem that these systems have an injurious effect upon the independence and mobility of labor, as it ties a man to his job by discouraging him from changing from one employer to another, which, it is claimed, are important factors in the securing of higher earnings and better conditions for wage-earners. "I have known of a case recently in which a large organization in this country notified all its old men that if they did not return to work in the event of a strike they would lose their pensions."* Furthermore, these systems at best, as was pointed out by many employers, are possible only in large industries.

Of the nearly fifty thousand public school teachers in Pennsylvania, only a little more than 600 are receiving pensions from the various retirement funds. The new State Retirement Fund which is coming into effect in July, 1919, is expected to benefit more. The number of policemen, firemen, and other municipal and State employees in the State receiving old age pensions did not exceed 1,700. The inadequacy of protection against old age provided by trade unions or fraternal organizations has already been discussed. It was seen that most of these are not established upon sound actuarial principles. Many have become insolvent and many more are liable to dissolution at any time. As a rule, all these pension funds are exempt from the strict supervision required of private insurance companies. The total number of pensioners in the State (not including pensioners of the United States) constitutes three per cent. of the total population over 65 years of age in the State. In other words, only three out of every hundred or thirty out of every thousand persons, 65 years of age and over, were protected by old age benefits in Pennsylvania in 1918. This percentage is computed on the total population 65 years of age and over as given by the 1910 census. It is obvious that it would be still lower if the increase in the aged population during the past eight years was taken into consideration. That very few old people in Pennsylvania are able to care for themselves even though they are not dependent upon public or private charity has been disclosed from the house-to-house studies. It was found that but few under the increased cost of living could save for old age.

That there is an old age problem is thus obvious. Practically all civilized countries have recognized it and have adopted one form or another of national schemes to cope with this. Even in the United States there is developing a general recognition of the obligation of society to protect in their old age the veterans of its "army of toil." This is evidenced by the rapid growth of industrial pensions and by the appointment, by numerous States, of commissions to study the problem. At least three States, Massachusetts, Arizona and Wisconsin have adopted some method to cope with this problem. Our own Governor, Honorable Wm. C. Sproul, in his inaugural address urged that "the important subjects of old age pensions and insurance against sickness . . . will have to be given close attention, and the whole subject brought up for inclusion in the State's social program."

The systems providing for old age as adopted in the various countries are generally classified under the following main schemes: (I) Voluntary insurance; (II) Compulsory-contributory insurance; (III) Gratuitous or straight pensions by the government.

Voluntary insurance against old age may be classified into several types: (A) Private Voluntary Insurance, (B) Voluntary Insurance Under Public Administration, (C) Voluntary Subsidized Insurance. Under the first are included: (1) The old age benefits provided by trade unions and fraternal organizations, (2) Insurance against old age by industrial corporations and (3) Insurance with private companies. All of these forms are business propositions pure and simple. They involve no state action except supervision. The extent of insurance through the above agencies is very limited.

(B) Voluntary Insurance Under Public Administration. In this form of insurance there is no state subsidy, but the government sells annuities and insurance at cheap rates. In addition to governmental guarantees, the state bears the expense of administration. This is the underlying principle in the state plans of savings in force in Massachusetts, Wisconsin and Canada. The aim of this insurance is to facilitate savings against old age and to make it attractive and accessible to wage-earners. The amount of insurance is limited and opportunities are offered employers of labor to co-operate with their employees either by making contributions towards the payment of the premium or by collecting it. The advantage of this form of state savings over private insurance lies in the cheapening of the premiums by the elimination of profits and the cost of administration.

(C) Voluntary Subsidized Insurance. The object here is to put a premium on savings for old age. The state in this case subsidizes individual thrift by means of a state contribution. These systems were practiced in France, Belgium, Italy, Serbia and Spain. They are devised with the special purpose of serving the wage-workers. The amounts of the subsidies vary in each country. The latter are not given to the insured but deposited to his account and go to swell the amount of the pension purchased.

The three preceding forms of voluntary insurance are the evolutionary outgrowth of one another. The chief reason urged in favor of voluntary insurance is that it encourages thrift and maintains the self-respect of its beneficiaries. It is pointed out however, by all experts that in practice after many decades of effort it has failed to accomplish its purpose. Even generous subsidies do not seem to attract more than a small part of the wage-earners, and in some countries these systems have to be partly or entirely superseded by other methods. "Voluntary subsidized insurance has never at any time or in any country accomplished its purpose. The common people don't insure."* Dr. Rubinow after an exhaustive discussion of the voluntary schemes in the several European countries concludes:

"1. That even a heavily subsidized system of voluntary old age insurance attracts only a small proportion of the working class, presumably of the better-paid strata.

"2. That even of those who begin accounts, a large and growing proportion fail to continue to make the necessary contributions with any regularity.

"3. That usually only the minimum is contributed which is necessary to acquire the subsidies.

"4. That the workmen are forced to reduce their old age pensions in order to safeguard the interest of their families, and

"5. That the pensions actually acquired are pitifully small."

II. COMPULSORY CONTRIBUTORY INSURANCE.

This form of insurance is a logical result of the failure of the voluntary systems. The great mass of wage-earners being either unwilling or unable to insure themselves against old age, European governments sought to overcome this by making it obligatory for certain classes of wage-workers—whose yearly income did not exceed a certain amount—to insure themselves against old age. The government making it attractive on the other hand, by subsidizing the insurance. Germany was the first country in Europe to establish compulsory insurance of working people. A system patterned after the German one was later adopted by France in 1910. Systems embodying the compulsory principles are also established in Austro-Hungary, Greece, Iceland, Italy, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Rumania, Russia and Sweden.

Under the compulsory form of insurance all wage-earners earning below a certain income are compelled to insure. Salaried workers above a set amount are not obligated to insure but may, in common with other classes, take out voluntary insurance. Participation in the plan begins at an early age. Contributions are generally made both by the employer and employee in equal parts. The state's contribution consists of bearing the expenses of administration. In addition, it also makes a direct contribution to the pension after it has matured. In Germany the contributions of the workers are graded in accordance with their income, while in France it is uniform for all adult males, females and minors. The employees' contributions are collected by the employer who is allowed to discount them from the wages of his workers. The age when one becomes entitled to a pension is set at 60 years of age in France, and 70 years in Germany. Before a person, however, can receive a pension he must have a necessary number of contributions: this in Germany is 1,200 weeks, and in France thirty annual contributions. To protect also those who cannot make the required number of contributions, provisions are made in both countries reducing the required period of contributions by 40 weeks for each year of age over 40 in Germany and thirty in France, when the law went into effect. The amount of the pension allowed under these plans is very small, rarely exceeding $60 a year—an allowance which cannot obviously go very far. No country which has introduced compulsory insurance has at any time attempted to raise more than fifty per cent. of the necessary funds from the insured new

*Miller, "Social Insurance in the United States," p. 112.

Dubinow, "Social Insurance," p. 344.

In Germany the contributions from the insured persons amount to about forty per cent, of the total disbursements, while in other countries it amounts to about thirty per cent, of the funds disbursed.

The advantage of the system of compulsory contributory insurance are as follows: (1) Its possibility of universality. By means of compulsion, insurance cannot only be extended to all classes that need most the protection against old age, but can also be made most effective. "Obligatory insurance, and obligatory alone, by making the support of insurance an indispensable item of the family budget, will act upon wages in such a way as to raise its standard, which increased expenditure will be shifted upon the cost of production and prices, and thus make a general industrial condition to be borne without any appreciable hardships."* (2) Compulsory insurance avoids the dependence upon charity. Under this system the worker gets his pension as a matter of right even when he is not poor "It is not a dead level system. It preserves a normal relation between the standards of life before and after the age of pension and also preserves a just relationship between service rendered and the rewards granted, for it is usually based upon the length of contributions, which is the length of productive activity." (3) It encourages thrift even tho not of a voluntary nature. (4) The need of old age pensions is largely a result of the industrial problem and ought to be borne by industry. "It is economically just, in so far as it exacts a contribution from the industry, for superannuation is not less a factor of modern industrial life than is the rate of accidents or of sickness. If it be just that each industry should contribute to the cost of accident compensation in proportion to the number of accidents occurring, rather than that the entire cost be forced back upon the national treasury, it would seem to be equally just that an industry which uses up men by forty-five or fifty-five years may be made to contribute to the cost of old-age support in a greater degree than another industry or occupation in which men can preserve their productive life until sixty-five. Looking upon it in another way, the justice of the claim may be admitted, that a contribution on the part of the industry to old-age insurance is but a deferred wage. . . . If, under modern industrial conditions, it could be expected that the wage-workers themselves would be able to raise the standard of wages to the necessary level so as to include the cost of old-age support, and that they would use this additional increment for that purpose, no compulsory system would be necessary. But the compulsory system is necessary just because these two conditions are found to be impossible." (5) It does not burden taxation directly. (6) Compulsory insurance is urged because of the fact that more countries have adopted this plan than any other, and because it has proved successful in Germany.

The objections to the compulsory principle of insurance are: (1) It cannot be made universal as it omits many who may need such protection, no less than wage-earners. It is pointed out that it can only be made to apply to persons who are in regular employment. It is almost impossible to collect contributions of persons who are irregularly employed, of agricultural laborers, of those who are their own employers, of women who work at home not for wages, of small merchants, and so forth. (2) It is impossible even through compulsion to reach the poorest class of workers who are most in need of old-age support. These people cannot save enough to contribute to pension funds. Thrift among workers who do not receive a living wage, it is contended, is a mockery, uneconomic and unsocial. (3) Compulsory insurance lessens the quality of self-help and reliance in the individual. "If this is the country of wealth it is also the country of individualistic ideals and achievements. It was founded to secure individual liberty of thought and action with opportunities for working out one's own salvation. This is its peculiar destiny and its special mission, and its greatest contribution to humanity will be in terms of character rather than wealth. Not for any reason of sentiment, but because our national progress under the individualistic ideal has been such as to demonstrate its wisdom and soundness, do I believe we should take no steps calculated to take us away from this path of development."*

(4) Where the compulsory system is established the sums contributed by the insured are practically insignificant. Not only does the state make a direct subsidy to the insured, but it also bears the expenses, which because of the inherent complexities of conducting the administrative machinery, and the recording of facts for a long period of years with reference to contributions, is enormously expensive. It has therefore, been advanced that there is practically no difference between the state paying pensions outright, and collecting the contributions by the compulsory principle. (5) Compulsory insurance is class legislation as it places the wage earning classes under a special regime. It necessitates the creation of a vast bureaucratic system. "It would be nothing but taxation, and being exacted from unwilling subjects, would carry with it none of the good influence of voluntary thrift." (6) Old age is not a problem of industry alone for people grow old despite all human efforts. "Old age defines itself." (7) The amount of the pension is small and the age set is too high. The pension as paid in European countries are, as is commonly expressed, "too little to exist on and too much to die on." (8) Compulsory contributions are inelastic and cannot be adjusted to the particular needs of the various industries and localities. (9) It is un-American, distasteful and contrary to the American spirit. The compulsory principle, it is claimed, is intolerable and would not be accepted by the American citizens. Mr. Arthur M. Huddell, a dissenting member of the Massachusetts Commission states the case as follows: "To my mind, compulsory insurance is un-American, and cannot be considered in any way as a solution of this question. The wages of the workman will not permit of any compulsory assessment for insurance. There is a vast difference between this and compulsory sanitary laws, compulsory education and compulsory quarantine laws. A poor man can comply with any of the above laws without an expenditure of money or in any way reducing his wages, which he could not do with a compulsory insurance law, as that would be equivalent to a reduction in wages. There is not sufficient margin between the living expenses and the wages of the workman to permit that reduction in his wages."

Captain Wm. P. White, U. S.-N., retired, argues: "We started in our country as individuals, and up to a comparatively recent time we have insisted upon the individual's right to conduct his life in his own way. The Declaration of Independence says that this Government was formed so that we might pursue individually life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness; but the complications of modern society are bringing about the feeling that upon the whole body of society rests the responsibility for caring for those who in the race have been crowded to the wall. And every civilization that has existed where some part of the community has depended upon the state for its protection, for its care, has gone to the wall."

"There is one great nation that has existed for 4,000 years, and it exists to-day potentially the strongest people on the globe. They have believed in the individual, or family; and they will succeed—if they still stick to the idea—after all the rest of the nations of the earth have disappeared. Now, if we want to protect our civilization, we have got to insist on individual responsibility. We cannot shift individual responsibility to society. We have got to teach the principles of industry. We cannot allow our young men to grow up in the faith that society in the long run will take care of them, if through their indifference to their own care they should fall by the wayside."†

(10) The compulsory principle is also believed to be unconstitutional as it obligates certain groups to set aside a certain percentage of their earnings to provide for old age.

III. STRAIGHT OR NON-CONTRIBUTORY PENSIONS.

Just as the compulsory insurance principle was an outgrowth of the failure of voluntary insurance, so is the establishment of straight pension systems a result brought about by the complexities and ineffectiveness of the compulsory insurance principle. Straight pensions are comprehensive and immediately effective, as compared with the compulsory forms which require a long term of years before they may work themselves out and be able to cope with the immediate problems. Originally state pensions were given as a result largely of the pressing problem of poor relief. This form of outdoor relief, was an improvement over the indoor relief which bore the brand of pauperism. Under this system neither the employer nor the employee make direct contributions. The funds are paid out from the general treasury. Systems of gratuitous pensions have been adopted by Denmark, New Zealand, Australia, France, Great Britain, New South Wales and Alaska and Arizona in the United States.

State pensions are usually granted to all persons complying with certain requirements. The specifications usually state that a person before receiving a pension must have attained a certain age; that he must have been a citizen of a long period of residence; that he must not have an income from any source above the specified amount. And sometimes it is also required that he must have fulfilled a certain period of service. In addition to these, most countries require also, certain moral and character qualifications. In many countries pensions are denied on account of family desertion, neglect of minor children, drunkenness, or prison sentence. It is generally specified that pensions are given to the "deserving poor." The first of these systems was established in Denmark in 1891. Due to the influence of Lloyd George, a straight old age pension system was adopted by Great Britain in 1908. In 1915, Alaska and Arizona in the United States had enacted similar systems. Although the principles involved are the same in all countries, the requirements and qualifications are widely varied in the several countries practicing these systems of pensioning the aged people.

The non-contributory form of old age relief is one of the most popular and most widely discussed plans. The advantages of this scheme over the voluntary and compulsory systems are as follows: (1) Its simplicity. Straight pensions are given only under definite and well defined conditions; the amounts are fixed and require little administrative expense. (2) Straight state pensions are just, as it is the duty of the state to take care of its aged poor. This obligation of the state, it is pointed out, has been recognized by the latter long ago in its distribution of poor relief. Pensions in old age would accordingly involve only the removal of the stigma and degradation of the present system of poor relief. It is claimed that the state, at present, relieves every class of suffering except old age. Pensions are, therefore, aimed to remove the sufferings and terror associated with old age. "It is compulsory now upon our citizens to make a living, but if they wish to become criminals, the state will support them. But the man who wants to remain a law-abiding citizen and try to support his family is compelled to provide for old age, when the facts are that he is unable at the present time to secure many of the comforts of life. Every law-abiding citizen has rendered to his country some service, which entitles him to look forward to a pension given in return; and as at present the premium placed upon crime and poverty is un-American, something should be done to provide for the law-abiding, self-supporting citizen."* (3) Although nominally non-contributory, it is contended that in reality all have contributed in the taxes they have paid. Mr. Lloyd George pointed this out as follows: "As long as you have taxes upon commodities which are consumed practically by every family in the country, there is no such thing as a non-contributory scheme. . . . Again, the worker who has contributed by his strength and his skill to the increase of the national wealth, has made his contributions to the fund from which his pensions is to come when he is no longer able to work." It is thus argued, that those who have given a considerable part of their lives in useful service have already made those contributions to the state and are entitled to freedom from the dread and anxiety of their needs during their declining years, and from the brand of pauperism. (4) The cost of the pension could be met considerably by savings on poor relief. The extent to which this would hold true in Pennsylvania is discussed in other parts of the report. (5) Non-contributory pensions by the state would encourage people to greater loyalty, ambitions, independence and hopefulness. It is argued that, "any change that will increase the feeling of security and confidence with which wage-earners contemplate the future will tend to cause them to make rational provisions for the future." James T. Buckley, another dissenting member of the Massachusetts Commission argues that, "Assurance through a pension, contributory or otherwise, that one's last days would be spent in peace and comfort, with no fear of poverty and want, would have a strengthening influence upon the individual, enabling him to go to his daily task with a calm and contented mind, and would tend to increase the sense of personal responsibility and independence." (6) Pensions in old age would keep families more closely together. It would increase filial affection and respect for parents. "A pension would bind the family more firmly together, for oftentimes the grandparent with a small guaranteed pension would be a welcome addition to the family of the son or daughter, when without this he would be only in the way."

The chief objections to straight government pensions in this country were stated by the Massachusetts Commission on Old Age Pensions, Annuities, and Insurance, in its report of 1910. This Commission concluded that, "The adoption of any scheme of non-contributory pensions in Massachusetts, or any other American State, seems inadvisable and impracticable." The reasons given were as follows: (1) The heavy expense involved in such a scheme. The Commission estimated that for Massachusetts to pay a pension of $200 per year or $4 per week for half the population 70 years of age and over, would cost that State not less than $10,000,000 per year.

The cost of providing pensions from 65 years of age and on would of course, be greatly increased. The 1910 census gives the population of Pennsylvania 65 years of age and over as 325,918. A similar estimate for half the population of 65 years and over in Pennsylvania would involve an expenditure of $32,591,800. To this it is argued that the great part of this cost is already paid by the citizens at present by means of the different charitable and philanthropic forms. Moreover, it is advanced by a dissenting member of the Massachusetts Commission that the argument of heavy expense "is fallacious; for the ultimate expense of any given project is the same, whether that cost be levied directly upon those who are to benefit by the scheme, as in the proposed contributory schemes, or indirectly upon the same beneficiaries through the medium of the State tax."* Again Dr. Rabinow argues that "when an institution is to be established, first, its necessity, its usefulness, or harmfulness must be considered, and only then the question of ways and means comes into the foreground."† (2) Straight pensions is class legislation as it taxes the rich for the benefit of the poor. "There is no real ground for the assertion that because an industrious man has failed to earn a sufficiency, he has a right to be rewarded for his industry out of the proceeds of a tax levied upon his neighbors, to whom he has rendered no service, or none which has not been paid for in wages."

(3) Gratuitous governmental pensions would destroy the habit of thrift, as it would lessen the sense of personal responsibility and independence. The case for this contention is stated by a leading opponent of social insurance in this country as follows: "It will undermine and tend to destroy the self-respecting character of our people as citizens of a democracy where economic independence, achieved by individual effort, self-sacrifice and self-denial, is, after all, the only aim worth while. However much we may be inclined to permit ourselves to be deceived by specious arguments of guess work philanthropy into believing the gift is to help the recipient and not to hinder, such gifts, with rare exceptions, are opposed to the principles of character-building and of character-maintenance throughout all the years which constitute the span of human life. . . . Hold out the prospect that such effort is not necessary, that earnings may be squandered for a thousand and one needless purposes, that restraint upon family expenditures is not required, and the most powerful incentive which makes for character and growth in a democracy is taken away."* President A. T. Hadley, of Yale University states: "We need measures which shall increase individual responsibility rather than diminish it; measures which shall give us more self-reliance, and less reliance on society as a whole. We cannot afford to counterance a system of morals or law which justifies the individual in looking to the community rather than to himself for support in age or infirmity."**

These arguments are refuted by students of the problem by pointing first to the fact that the great majority of the people who reach old age and who qualify for pensions in the countries having pension systems, is in itself sufficient evidence that there was either no habit of thrift to be destroyed or that the conditions of the wages were so low that savings were impossible. It is also evident that the habit of thrift can hardly be destroyed by a pension—which at best, is hardly sufficient to keep body and soul together—paid at the remote and uncertain possibility of attaining old age. On the contrary, it is pointed out, it would be an incentive to saving as the pension allowance meeting only the bare necessities would enable a person with a little savings to spend his declining days in comfort. The Wisconsin Industrial Commission, in its report of 1915 points out that non-contributory pensions do not discourage saving and cites the example of Denmark which was the first to establish such a system, and where after twenty years of experience the number of applicants for old age pensions shows a tendency to decrease rather than the contrary, so that it cannot be said that habits of thrift have declined.

"I found in Denmark that the people who had most right to speak with authority on the subject maintain that the law has not acted in a way detrimental to thrift. The Inspector-General of the Sick Relief Funds holds that they are more thrifty." (Miss Sellers' evidence before Aged Pensioners Committee, 1903, p. 5).* "Whether we take Germany, Australia or Denmark, the answer is the same. Thrift, instead of vanishing before old age pensions has actually increased. There has been more money placed in the German Savings banks since 1891."

The Australian Royal Commission in its report of 1907, concluded that "The question as to whether thrift is discouraged by Old Age Pensions has been enquired into by your commissioners, and they have arrived at the conclusion that the fact of a necessitous person being entitled to a pension of 10s. a week at the age of 65 years will not have any appreciable influence on saving habits at an earlier age." Mr. Miles M. Dawson, a leading authority is quoted as saying, "I think there has been an error about pensions checking the savings. In any country where it has been adopted, in Denmark, Great Britain, New Zealand, etc., the amount of savings has been continually enlarging."*

(4) It is also contended that non-contributory pensions would lower wages. This argument is based upon the following assumption: (a) Because of the direct competition of the pensioned employee. (b) The prospect of a pension in future years would lead workers to accept lower wages than they would otherwise be disposed to demand. This it is claimed is the case in the industries where pensions are now established. (c) It would encourage undesirable immigration, as it would invite immigrants from outside the state, and thus depress the wage rate by overcrowding the labor market. The fallacy of the first of these points has already been pointed out in another place, where it was shown that the number of people still able to do work at the age when pensions are given is very insignificant in Pennsylvania. These men are a very unimportant factor in the labor market. Moreover, this argument if true, would apply equally as well to any form of savings or even contributions from children. Again as was pointed out before, it is evident that a man with no income whatsoever is a more dangerous competitor in the labor market than the man with some means of support. The second argument is obviously far-fetched. It requires a lot of imagination to suppose that the prospect of a very meager assistance in their old age would alone be sufficient to make wage-earners work for lower wages. Furthermore, it is known to all students that the wage rate paid, at the present time, does not presume savings for old age as a prime element and daily necessity of the working people. While there is some truth that in the industries having regular pension systems the wage rates of certain classes of workers—especially those past their middle age—may be lower than in other industries not having such systems, it is because there is the incentive to work in the one particular industry over the other. How a state-wide pension system could have a similar effect is difficult to see. As to the third contention of encouraging immigration it is not borne out by the facts in the countries where such systems are in operation. Long terms of residence within the state is required everywhere, and immigration, as is well known, is not popular with men past middle age. That a small pension given, when reaching old age would hardly be a sufficient inducement to young immigrants, is self-evident.

(5) Straight pensions, concludes the Massachusetts Commission, would have a disintegrating effect upon the family. "A non-contributory pension system would take away, in part, the filial obligation for the support of aged parents, which is a main bond of family solidarity. It would strike at one of the forces that have created the self-supporting, self-respecting American family. The impairment of family solidarity is one of the most serious consequences to be apprehended from an experiment with non-contributory pensions."*

Mr. A. M. Huddell, in presenting a dissenting opinion upon this point states: "The facts that are before us as to the influence of pensions on the American family have either been entirely overlooked or misconstrued by the majority of the commissioners. We have before us the pension of the veterans of the Civil War, their widows and orphans, and I fail to find the evidence that warrants any statement to the effect that this pension by the United States Government has disintegrated the family, or lessened 'the filial obligation for the support of the aged parents,' or has in any way impaired the family solidarity. On the contrary, the pensions to the veterans of the Civil War has built up the American family, and the filial obligation of the family has been strengthened and its solidarity maintained. An old person living with a married son or daughter that is striving to bring up a family and provide for them as an American family should be provided for, and give to the children a proper education, can find a place for the veteran or his widow who receives a pension from the Government in the family, because they do not take away from the family any of the necessities of life, or stop in any way the education of the children. At the same time, the independence of the veteran or his widow is maintained, because they have enough to pay for their needs at that period of life

With this pension the old veteran and his widow are made comfortable in their old age by living with their children, their friends, or in homes where they are paying their own way, and have a feeling of independence that old people should have. They know they are not taking away from the family any of the necessities of life, or hampering the education of the children through any expense of their own support. Any extra expense in the workman's family directly affects the education of the child, compelling him to leave school and seek employment to help maintain the family."

The same argument is also answered by Mr. L. W. Squire as follows: "Fortunately or unfortunately, according to the standpoint of religion and economics from which one views the matter, we Americans have not that conception of the family, as the unit of society, and that reverence for old age, which is ingrafted upon the heart of the Oriental in all his religious and economic training. In China and Japan it is rare to find any individual in want above sixty years of age, who has not some relative, no matter how remote, whose ethics and religion command him to make a place in his home for the indigent one, and provide for him as if he were a member of his own immediate family. Almshouses, private indoor or outdoor relief, for the old, are hardly known in those Oriental lands, where high ethical regard for the aged is instilled into the individual common mind from infancy. Unfortunately, however, in this country, no such esteem for the aged one prevails, except among his near relatives and especially in agricultural communities. In our manufacturing centers especially, the helpless, destitute grandfather or grandmother is regarded as a distinct burden to the household, the carrying of which oftentimes forces the children out of school and into the streets, factories, or shops, in order to provide for the added increment to the household expenses which the taking on of an aged relative, no matter how near he may be to the immediate family, entails."

Dr. Rubinow puts it this way: "There is a good, old-fashioned atavistic nobility of sentiment about this argument which will greatly please all good men and women except those who have to be supported by their children, and those who have to support their parents and also their own families on a wage-earner's budget. Scientifically the argument is certainly original, because it assumes the basis of the family to be the support of the older generation by the younger, while it has always been fairly well agreed upon by all students of society that the shoe was on the other foot, and that the care of children by the parents was the proper function of family. It further seems to assume that we love our burdens, and that when parents cease being burdens the children cease loving them.

"It assumes that the standing of a superannuated parent in a family is in an inverse proportion to the amount he is able to contribute to the family budget. It is an appeal to an ideal of a patriarchal family which has been dead for a century in every industrial country, and which really never had any strong hold upon American life. Of course, its inapplicability to the aged single man or the aged spinster aunt will be evident. For it certainly cannot be claimed that the support of all spinster aunts is also a fundamental principle of American family solidarity. Then, again, even married people may not have any children, or may have lost them. One must remember that New England was practising race suicide long before the term ever became popular. As a matter of fact, the very data gathered by the Commission shows that of the inmates of almshouses and benevolent homes over twenty-five per cent. were single and of those receiving outdoor relief fifteen per cent.

"Furthermore, these data also show how these almshouses and homes do break down the solidarity of the American family. Of their inmates forty-two per cent. had adult children living at time of entrance, of the several thousand pensioners receiving outdoor relief, sixty per cent. had adult children at the time of investigation, and fifty-nine per cent. other near relatives. It is really surprising that the Commission did not recommend discontinuance of aid, both institutional and outdoor, because of the demoralizing effect upon said children and relatives.

"However, the same table which conveys the information just quoted shows that while there were children in some 60 per cent. only in 22 per cent. were they able to render aid; that this proportion was only some 10 per cent. in case of the inmates of homes, and about 50 per cent. in case of persons receiving outdoor relief. Moreover, it appears from another table that some 40 per cent. were receiving aid from children or relatives, as outdoor relief is seldom bountiful."*

From the Commission's studies it was seen that in the case of both almshouse and benevolent institution inmates, more than sixty-five and a half per cent. had no children living. Of the aged applicants for relief, about forty per cent. had no children, and among the general aged population, although the percentage of those having no children at all was little more than ten per cent., only 24 per cent. of the aged were actually supported by children, while 43 per cent. had no other sources of income.

(6) Straight pensions are objected to also because they resemble charity much more than a system of insurance in which the worker makes a contribution. This, however, depends largely upon public opinion. Considered in the light of deferred real wages instead of poor relief, the receipt of a pension would not involve any degrading effects.

(7) Non-contributory pensions by the state, argues the Massachusetts Commission will result in "mischievous political effects. It would open the door to political favoritism of various sorts." William H. Lackey contends that "Such a question would infallibly pass into the competitions of party warfare. It would become in most constituencies one of the most prominent of electioneering tests. Rival candidates would be competing for the vote of a wage-earning electorate who had a direct pecuniary interest in increasing or extending pensions and in relaxing the conditions on which they are given. Can it be doubted that in many cases their first object would be to outbid another, and that national and party politics would soon be forced into a demoralizing race of extravagance?"*

(8) The constitutionality of such a scheme is also questioned by the Massachusetts Commission. Strangely enough, however, it admits that firemen, policemen and teachers who "are not only rendering peculiarly hazardous meritorious services to society, but also have deprived themselves of the full opportunity of earning the largest returns for their services in a competitive way . . . have some claim upon the State for special consideration in the matter of public support in old age. This claim, however, cannot exist in the case of persons employed in the ordinary competitive callings." The fallacious method of the Commission's reasoning at this point is self-evident.

The basis of the Massachusetts Commission's opposition to the non-contributory system may be seen summed up in its concluding paragraph as follows: "A non-contributory pension system is simply a counsel of despair. If such a scheme be defensible or excusable in this country, then the whole economic and social system is a failure. The adoption of such a policy would be a confession of its breakdown. To contend that it is necessary to take this course is to assume that members of the working class either cannot earn enough, or cannot save enough, to take care of themselves in old age. If that be true, then American democracy is in a state of decay which no system of public doles could possibly arrest, but would rather hasten."

IV. THE CASE FOR AND AGAINST UNIVERSAL AND PARTIAL SCHEMES.

When either the compulsory-contributory, or non-contributory pensions are discussed the question whether they shall be universal or partial, is to be taken into consideration. The universal scheme involves a total change of front as to the policy of public relief. It is based no longer upon the theory of relief of destitution only. It aims to extend pensions to all, or almost all, the aged over a certain age without any conditions. The funds to be drawn from the common purse. This would necessarily involve a steady increase in both the number of persons and cost and would, as stated by Sir Charles Booth, mean that "the policy of doing so is the opposite of that adopted in savage states, where the old, when incapable, are knocked on the head." No such system, however, is as yet, in operation anywhere. The principle of partial insurance or pensions is, as was pointed out before, established now in many countries. Pensions established now by foreign countries are given only to men and women belonging to certain wage groups or to persons having fulfilled certain specified requirements.

The universal principle is advanced principally, because, it is argued, if pensions were offered to all aged persons, it would remove entirely the savor of dependency or pauperism. Charles Booth, the foremost advocate of universal pensions in Great Britain, presents the case for such a system as follows: "The idea in the minds of those who think that poverty and desert should be the conditions of relief, tend rather to an elaboration of the Poor Law, which by classifying those who ask its aid and varying the awards, shall make them as often a mark of merit as a stigma of disgrace. I must confess that this, to me, appears an impossible ideal. I can imagine no court of inquiry that could be trusted. I believe that the selected poor who receive pensions or were provided for in almshouses, to which only their poverty and their good conduct entitled them, would still be considered and consider themselves paupers, by whatever name they might be called. If to obtain a certificate of merit involved a searching inquiry into the past life of each applicant, it would, I believe, be strongly resented, and most of all by the most worthy. Even the simplest form such an inquiry could take, limiting itself to proof of thrift, would be unsatisfactory, as the best proof of thrift would always lie in having no need to apply." He further argues: "Indoor relief lacks humanity and outdoor encourages improvidence. We are therefore justified in seeking some better plan. Pensions at 65 are suggested, to be acquired voluntarily with state aid. But, to be effectual, the system must be universal, or the improvident would still trust to the rates (outdoor relief), and their treatment unceasingly oscillate between foolish kindness and unpopular severity. If the system is to be universal, it must be compulsory; and if compulsory, its cost, however collected, is taxation. Moreover, to be satisfactory, the system must apply to the old of our own time.

We shall not tax ourselves for a benefit only to be realized after 40 years have passed. But if this system is to be universal, and to apply to our own old people, the forms of insurance become absurd. Why earmark the payments, and accumulate funds at all? It is not insurance we require, but the endowment of old age. In another connection he states: "Benefits which all may enjoy carry with them no slur. Educational endowments are enjoyed by the rich, free elementary education as bestowed upon the poorer classes, the facilities offered by free libraries, etc., are cases in point. Pensions open to all and paid for out of taxation would have nothing, either morally or economically, in common with pauperism."* And again, "No other plan of selection is possible except at sacrifice of independence. To select the poor is to pauperize, to select the deserving is to patronize. To do either is to humiliate."**

In favor of the universal plan is also urged its simplicity and cheapness of administration. This system requires no complicated or troublesome conditions of eligibility, nor does it entail many details.

Many of the objections to the universal plan have already been stated in the discussions of the compulsory and non-contributory systems. What has been brought against the former systems may apply equally as well, and even more so, against the universal scheme. Additional objections offered are: (1) Its increased cost. A universal scheme is obviously the most costly of all pension systems, and, it is pointed out, that to give a pension to all people—to well-to-do and wealthy who do not need them—is a waste of money. (2) There are also objections against the giving of pensions indiscriminately to undeserving persons such as criminals or paupers. "The inclusion of criminals and paupers within the pensionable population is indefensible on any ground of individual desert or public policy. Such persons clearly have no claim to a pension, whatever may be true of the deserving and respectable aged poor. Moreover, the policy of pensioning the industrious and thrifty, the sober and the temperate, the deserving and the undeserving, indiscriminately, would be in the highest degree pauperizing and demoralizing. It would put a premium upon thriftlessness and dependency."* (3) It is also argued that any such state-wide scheme has no finality to it. Once embarked upon a venture, there would always be the agitation and temptation to reduce the age of pensioning and increase the pension amounts. (4) Under a universal scheme there would be even lesser means of preventing fraud and imposition. This, it is pointed out, is continually taking place in army pensions. (5) The pensioner may dissipate his income on the day when it is paid. "The pension, it is also claimed, would benefit little, those who are too old or infirm to live alone.

CHAPTER IV.

OLD AGE PENSION SYSTEMS OF FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

INTRODUCTORY NOTE.

The aim of this chapter is to present briefly the different systems adopted by the various countries to meet the problem of aged dependency. An attempt was made to bring the data up to date. This was only partly successful, however, as the literature and statistical material from European countries, readily obtainable under normal conditions, have been very meager during the past few years on account of the war. A careful search of the files of the libraries of the Congress, Federal Labor Department, American Association for Labor Legislation, and the New York public library failed to disclose more complete information. Most of the data incorporated in this chapter have, therefore, been taken from recent studies, such as, the "Report of a Special Inquiry Relative to Aged and Dependent Persons in Massachusetts," 1916; I. M. Rubinow's "Social Insurance," 1913 and such bulletins of the International Labor Office as were available, in addition to the various official government publications that have recently reached this country. It is interesting to point out that, altho, the consideration of the subject of old age pensions is comparatively recent in this country, it has been discussed and has constituted a problem of great significance, in many countries, for more than a half a century. At the present time, at least twenty-one foreign governments—including all the leading countries in Europe—and three States in the Union, as well as the Territory of Alaska, have enacted legislation of one form or another to cope with this problem. The divisions in this chapter are made in accordance with the nature of the pension system in existence, i. e., either voluntary, compulsory, or non-contributory. The countries in each division are presented in alphabetical order.

I. VOLUNTARY AND SUBSIDIZED SYSTEMS OF OLD AGE INSURANCE.

BELGIUM.

The Belgian "General Savings and Retirement Fund" was originally established in 1850. During the 50 years which followed, several attempts were made to attract a greater number of people into the fund by reducing the minimum of deposits, by influencing children from 6 to 14 years of age to join the fund, as well as by appropriations for annual subsidies by the national and provincial governments to mutual aid societies, who induce their members to join the fund. Little success, however, was achieved thru these measures, as far as solving the pressing problem of old age relief.

The law of 1900 was, therefore, enacted which sought to encourage wage-earners to provide annuities for old age, by assisting them thru state contributions and by giving special grants to the needy aged. The law provides that any person over 18 years of age may pay into the fund for himself or for another person. The depositors are not required to make regular payments either at fixed periods or of a fixed amount. Minimum deposits, however, are one franc (19 cents). The law excluded from benefits those classes who pay above a certain minimum amount in taxes or licenses, and state officials who are entitled to old age pensions by virtue of existing laws. The age when annuities are payable is set at 65, and the amounts of the annuity cannot exceed 1,200 francs ($231.60). The government adds its contribution in the form of premiums which are added to the sums paid by the insured. Governmental premiums cease when the sums credited to the insured are sufficient to secure an annuity of 360 francs ($72.00).

Originally the governmental allowances were rather small and did not prove sufficiently attractive to the old people. The amounts were, therefore, increased in 1903, so that the government gave an allowance of one hundred per cent. on the first six francs ($1.16) deposited by a person, who on January 1st, 1903, was between the ages of 40 to 45; for those persons who were between the ages of 45 to 50 on that date, the subsidy rose to 150 per cent. and amounted to 200 per cent. on the first 6 francs ($1.16), to those persons who were 50 years old at the time the law was enacted. The effect of these subsidies may be seen from the following figures. "In 1890 the number of insured was only 10,000 and under the influence of the subsidies began to grow, though slowly, and by 1899 it amounted to 169,000. The systematic granting of subsidies ordered by the act of 1900, in one year doubled the number of depositors. In 1902 it reached half a million. The increase in the rate of subsidies in 1903 brought the number to 636,000, and by 1910 it was well over 1,000,000."*

To meet the immediate problem of old age relief, the Belgium government in addition to subsidizing savings, practically established a system of temporary straight old-age pensions. A straight pension was given to all persons 65 years of age and over, if they were Belgian subjects and had been residents of Belgium for at least one year prior to their application for relief. They must also have been workmen, which is defined as, "men and women habitually working with their hands for an employer, in consideration of a wage, whether such work be performed on time wage or piece wage, at home or away from home, and whether it be domestic, agricultural, industrial or handicraft work."* The applicant must also be in want, which means one whose resources are under ordinary circumstances insufficient to enable him to support himself and his family in accordance with the standard of comfort prevailing among workmen of his trade in the district in which he resides."

The amount of the straight pension given is very small, namely, 65 francs ($12.55). The law also provided that persons who were not less than 55 years of age in 1901 were to get a similar pension when reaching the age of 65. But those between the ages of 55 and 58 inclusive, were to get no pension, unless they have paid into the general fund for at least three years a total of not less than 18 francs ($3.47). This was to have ceased on January 1st, 1911, but the law of May 11, 1912, made a further extension to persons who belonged to the last named age group at the time of the passage of the act, which was to have prolonged it to 1914. Altho the experience of the Belgian fund has proved more successful than any other, it was obviously due to the extreme measures undertaken to attract depositors. The subsidies, in many cases, amounted to practically straight governmental grants. It is also claimed that, in spite of these efforts, the average annual payment per account in Belgium has been steadily decreasing.

CANADA.

In 1908 the Canadian Parliament passed an act authorizing the issuing of government annuities for old age. Amending acts were passed in 1909, in 1910 and in June 1913. The minister of trade and commerce, under this act, is authorized to make contracts with any person domiciled in Canada for the sale of an immediate deferred annuity, as follows: "(1) For the life of the annuitant, (2) for a term of years certain, not exceeding 20 years, provided the annuitant shall so long live, (3) for a term of years certain, not exceeding 20 years, or for the life of the annuitant, whichever period shall be the longer. Also for an immediate or deferred annuity to any two persons domiciled in Canada during their joint lives and with or without continuation to the survivor."

No annuity can be granted on the life of any person other than that of the actual annuitant. It cannot be less than $50 a year and the total amount payable by way of an annuity cannot exceed $10,000 a year. Except in cases of invalidity or disablement, no annuity shall be payable before the age of 55 years. If the annuitant dies before the expiration of the specified number of years, the annuity must be paid to his legal representatives for the remaining number of years, unless agreements to the contrary have been made between the State and the annuitant.

The system of government annuities is in charge of a superintendent of government annuities in the department of trade and commerce. Payments are made in three forms: weekly payment, yearly payment, and single payment. The rates for females are somewhat higher than those for males. Premiums may be paid to the department directly or to any postmaster. Any person between the ages of 5 and 85 may purchase an annuity, and any contract providing for the annuity to commence at a greater age than 85, is subject to the same terms of purchase price, as if the age were exactly 85. Plans are also provided by which employers may co-operate with their employees in the purchase of annuities.

In addition to this voluntary insurance system against old age, the government has also provided for the benefit of the employees of the Inter-colonial Railways and Prince Edward Island Railways, a separate fund which was established by the Act of March 27th, 1907, and which was later amended in 1908 and in June 1913. Under this fund, the insured persons and the state contribute equal shares, the latter's contribution, however, cannot exceed $100,000 per annum. The employee's first monthly contribution is fixed at three per cent. of the monthly wage, and the remainder at one and one-half per cent. Pensions are given, (1) to those who have attained the age of 70; (2) to those who have become physically or mentally incapacitated; (3) to persons who have attained the age of 60 and wish to be retired from service (after 15 years of service in all the three cases); (4) to persons permanently disabled, as a result of injuries while at work, and (5) to persons who at the time when the act was passed have already reached the age of seventy and who have been at least ten years in the service. The amount of the pension is based on one and one-half per cent. of the average monthly pay received during the 8 years immediately preceding the granting of the allowance, multiplied by the number of years of service. The maximum, however, is $20 per month, and cannot be more than two-thirds of the average monthly wage. It is also provided that before an employee can become entitled to participate in any of the benefits he must serve 6 months on probation, during which period he must contribute to the fund.

ITALY.

The Italian "National Institution For the Insurance of Workers Against Invalidity and Old Age" was established in 1898. Since then it has been amended several times. It is a system of voluntary insurance for wage-earners as expressly avowed in its name. Its purpose is to offer protection against old age to manual laborers, and other citizens who pay a tax not exceeding 30 lire ($5.79) per year. Other classes also may insure themselves but have no right to the special subsidies. In the beginning, the government appropriated ten million lire ($2,000,000) and provided, in addition, certain other revenues for the fund.

The pensionable age is 60 years for men and 55 for women. Men employed in mines, furnaces, glass factories, foundries, railroads, etc., may be pensioned at 55. The pension may also be postponed to 65, in that case, increasing proportionately. The amount to be deposited annually is left to the discretion of the insured, but a minimum of six lire ($1.16) annually is required, no single contribution of which is to be less than 1 lire (19c). For the special industries mentioned, the minimum is nine lire. The government's contribution must not exceed ten lire ($1.92) per annum. Twenty-five years of contributions is required, but this period may be reduced for persons advanced in years; and special subsidies are also provided for those whose acquired pension would be too small. In case of permanent invalidity—which means the reduction to less than one-third of the normal earning capacity—payment of annuities is allowed after five years of contributions to the fund have been made. A special invalidity fund has been created for this purpose, and special benefits are given to invalids.

The amount of annuities range from 120 lire ($23.76) to 360 lire ($69.48). At the end of 1910 the total number of accounts opened was 300,000 amounting to some $5,000,000. The number insured, according to Dr. Rubinow, after twelve years of the fund's operation, constituted only 2 per cent. of the total population gainfully employed in that country. He also claims that "the period of greatest growth for the Italian system seems to have passed. In 1906 over 50,000 new accounts were started, in 1907, 35,000, and in 1908, less than 29,000."*

*The figures presented by Dr. Rubinow, in his book on "Social Insurance," page 343, give the number of new persons insured in 1908 as 150,000. This is, doubtless, a result of a typographical error, as the "Bollettino Dell Ufficio Del Lavoro, 1904 to 1909, and Die Arbeiter-Versicherung im Auslande, Dr. Zacher, quoted in the Twenty-fourth Annual Report of the United States Commissioner of Labor, Vol. 2, p. 1895, 1909, give the total number of insured during that year as 50,751. The figures given in the same table for the entire period—1899 to 1908—however, do not seem to warrant his conclusions. The table follows:

*Twenty-fourth Annual Report of United States Commissioner of Labor, Vol. 1, p. 511.

Ibid., p. 512.

The Italian system has also a compulsory feature for the employees of the following governmental industries: tobacco, engraving and printing, salt works, railway employees, employees in the shipping industry and sailors. The age of pensioning for these groups is the same as in the voluntary system. The monthly contribution required 2 lire for men and one lire for women. The minimum pension is 480 lire ($92.64) for men and 300 lire ($57.90) for women. The state's annual contribution is 34 lire, ($6.56), for men, and 22 lire, ($4.25), for women.

MASSACHUSETTS SYSTEM OF SAVINGS BANK, LIFE INSURANCE AND OLD AGE ANNUITIES.

The Massachusetts system of savings bank insurance was devised and sponsored by Supreme Court Justice Louis D. Brandeis, and the Massachusetts Savings Insurance League. The system first went into operation in June, 1908. The State law authorizes savings banks to establish insurance departments which may issue policies upon the lives of persons, and sell annuities in accordance with the regulations provided by the State Insurance Commissioner. These savings banks have no stockholders and are operated solely for the benefit of the depositors.

The author of the plan stated that the purpose of the act was: (1) "to give Massachusetts wage-earners an opportunity to secure safe life insurance at the lowest possible cost, as a substitute for industrial life insurance; . . . (2) To give to Massachusetts wage-earners an opportunity to make provisions for their old age by the purchase, out of current earnings, of annuities at the lowest possible cost. (3) It is also designed to furnish a partial solution of the problem of providing for the superannuated workman, by making the opportunities for saving the workman's money as numerous as the opportunities for wasting it."*

Under the savings bank insurance system the following forms of insurance are offered to residents of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, or persons regularly employed therein: (1) Straight Life Insurance; (2) Twenty Payment Life Insurance; (3) Twenty Year Endowment Insurance; (4) Old Age Annuities; (5) Combination Insurance and Annuities and (6) Immediate Annuities. The maximum life insurance policy written is $4,000 and the maximum annuity cannot be for more than $800 per year.

The expenses involved in the administration of the savings bank insurance is borne largely by the State. In order to reduce the expenses involved in this form of insurance, banks are not permitted to employ paid solicitors or house-to-house collectors of insurance premiums. In addition, dividends to stockholders are also eliminated. As a result of this, it is claimed, that savings banks are able to offer insurance at considerably lower rates than the rates formerly charged by commercial companies. In addition, every policyholder at the end of each year receives a check from the bank representing his share of the net profits of the business. This distribution of profits, it is contended, has tended not only to reduce the number of lapses but also to encourage savings bank deposits.

The following table shows the amounts of the monthly premiums for the different policies:

"From the above," writes Miss Alice H. Grady, Secretary of the Savings Bank Life Insurance, "it will be observed that there is reserved for the benefit of policyholders, or has already been paid back to them, amounts aggregating $1,585,844.01, that is, a sum largely in excess of the total amounts received from all policyholders since the system was put into operation. This is a most encouraging demonstration of the excellent earning power and conservative management of the four banks which have been licensed to establish life insurance departments."

The different insurance banks have agencies in large manufacturing and commercial establishments, people's institutes, social settlements and trade unions. At the present time, the four banks having insurance departments, have established also forty-five public agencies in savings banks; nineteen public agencies in trust companies; 225 agencies in mills, shops and factories, and 20 other public agencies.

The advantages of this insurance consist not only in its cheaper rates, but many other beneficial effects are claimed to have been brought about by these banks. Miss Grady claims that: "Coincident with the establishment of savings-bank life insurance in Massachusetts, the big industrial companies not only improved the conditions of their policies but also reduced the cost of their weekly premium insurance about 20 per cent. The great significance of this reduction has become increasingly apparent as the years have come and gone. For instance, during the year 1915, the wage earners of Massachusetts alone paid to the industrial insurance companies on weekly premium policies the astonishing sum of $12,000,000. Had it not been for the reduction in cost above referred to, it is a fair assumption that the amount paid to the industrial companies last year by our Massachusetts alone paid to the industrial insurance companies on weekly premium policies the astonishing sum of $12,000,000. Had it not been for the reduction in cost above referred to, it is a fair assumption that the amount paid to the industrial companies last year by our Massachusetts people would have been not $12,000,000 but $15,000,000. Those $3,000,000 remain in the pockets of the Massachusetts wage earners or have been used by them to purchase other necessities of life. Bearing this in mind, it is not difficult to understand why the State is willing to contribute the modest sum of $20,000 a year toward the support of an institution which has been instrumental in bringing about this immense annual saving to our people. One might even go so far as to hazard the suggestion that the people of Massachusetts are getting an extraordinary good return on an exceedingly small investment."

The extent that voluntary insurance against old age may be expected to relieve the problem of aged dependency in the United States, may be seen from the experiences of the Massachusetts system. On February 8, 1919, after ten years of existence there were in force 14,085 level premium life insurance policies amounting to $7,396,826; 8,091 employees group insurance policies amounting to $2,926,400 and only 215 old age annuities amounting to $30,468. The total annuity contracts written since 1908 was 288, of which four were terminated by death, 20 terminated by surrender, six more by lapses and 43 changed to other forms of insurance. These figures show clearly to what extent voluntary insurance is succeeding in the United States.

Miss Alice H. Grady, altho, admitting that, "from the above it might be inferred that the people are not willing to purchase annuities," contends, nevertheless, that "this inference is not entirely correct, the simple fact being that the people do not know about them. For lack of funds we have not yet been able to demonstrate what could be done by means of an educational campaign to teach the people what deferred annuities are and the advantage of this form of savings against old age.

"We believe that if the time shall come when we are able to bring home to our people, by means of a systematic educational campaign, the knowledge and benefits of this system, we shall find them both intelligent and responsive to this form of appeal, and ready to make voluntary saving against old age, as they are now learning to do against sickness and death."

SPAIN.

The "Spanish Old Age Insurance Institution" was established in 1908. It is chiefly modeled after the Italian system. It provides insurance for wage workers and state employes. Salaried, or official employes, may be insured if their earnings do not exceed 3,000 pesetas ($579) per year. The amount of the pension to be secured is left to the discretion of the insured. The maximum amount, however, is 1,500 pesetas ($289.50) per year. The amount of the subsidy is also left to the discretion of the directors of the institute but must not exceed 12 pesetas ($2.32) per person, during the first ten years of the institution's existence. For the benefit of those who were of advanced years, at the time of the establishment of the institution, special subsidies are granted. State subsidies are given only to those persons who have made some payments into the fund during the preceding year. The latter are denied also to those who are receiving pensions either from the government or private sources and to those classes who pay a direct tax above a certain sum. The participants in the state subsidies must also be Spanish citizens, living in Spain, and over 18 years of age.

The government has endowed the fund at its inauguration with 500,000 pesetas ($96,500). In addition it contributes annually not less than 125,000 pesetas ($24,125). The insurance fund is kept separated from the government treasury and there is close relation between the national insurance institution and other old age insurance funds. Altho the government encourages private insurance institutes, it does not grant them subsidies.

SWITZERLAND.

In Switzerland there are two cantonal insurance organizations, the Social Insurance Fund of Canton Neuchatel and the Old Age Insurance Fund of Canton Vaud. The former is a mutual organization with optional membership which was established by the cantonal law of May 15, 1906, and which enjoys a cantonal subsidy. It provides straight life insurance policies as well as mixed and annuity policies.

Of the total number of policies during the year 1913, 6,620 policies, representing insurance to the amount of $1,242,920, were straight life insurance policies, and 7,707 policies, representing $2,653,750, were mixed policies and 545 policies, representing $50,180, were annuity policies.

The Old Age Insurance Fund established in Canton

Vaud, by the law dated March 2, 1907, combines old age insurance with various forms of savings deposits. The premiums or deposits may be either definite or provisional; the latter may be withdrawn within 10 years after payment. The principal purpose of this is to enable employers to provide old age insurance for their workmen without being compelled to risk losing such payments, in case of the premature death or disability of the insured. This insurance fund also makes special efforts to encourage deposits by women and children, especially school children. The cantonal government further makes very liberal contributions to the premium or deposits of citizens of the Canton, who are industrial tradesmen or workmen, whose annuities do not fall due before their 55th year, and whose annual premiums or deposits range from 6 francs ($1.15) and do not exceed 60 francs ($11.58).

The total number of the insured during the years 1912 and 1913 were 13,823 and 14,996 respectively; the total premiums received were $30,141 and $33,531, to which there was added $15,052 and $16,664 cantonal contributions. The total payments to the insured amounted to only $470, and $724, respectively. The comparatively low payments are explained by the fact that the fund has been in existence a short time.*

WISCONSIN.

A State Insurance System was established in Wisconsin in 1911. The State sells both annuities and life insurance. Unlike the Massachusetts plan, the expense of administration is not borne by the State, but is paid from the insurance funds. No detailed information is available.

II COMPULSORY-CONTRIBUTORY OLD AGE INSURANCE.

AUSTRIA.

Agitation for a system of insurance for salaried persons, private officials, etc., began in Austria as early as 1888. A bill for that purpose was introduced in 1901. The first such law, however, did not come into effect until January 1st, 1909. This act provided a limited system of contributory old age and invalidity insurance, restricted to certain classes of salaried employees. This act was amended in essential respects by an imperial decree on June 25, 1914, and was intended to become effective on the first of October, 1914, but due to the outbreak of the war, an order dated August 24, 1914, provided that the benefits should be retroactive as from the First of August, 1914.

While the object of the insurance is to build up a right to an invalidity or old age pension for the insured person himself, it differs from most other compulsory schemes, as it is not a system of working class insurance, but rather of the middle classes. Only the following classes are compelled to insure themselves: (1) Employees working in Austria, who have the character of officials by virtue of their position; (2) those engaged in duties of a preponderately intellectual character, both of which groups must have at least a total annual income under one and the same employer of 600 kr., ($121.80); (3) those engaged in the managements of works or departments of works; (4) supervisors over the work of other persons, and (5) those serving on the staffs of offices and counting-houses. Salesmen and other clerks, come under the compulsory insurance only if they have received the required higher education. The law does not compel to insure those engaged in domestic service or as workers and apprentices in the production of goods, in industry, mining, agriculture and forestry. Exempted from the compulsory insurance are also, persons who do not enter an employment to which the insurance applies until they are 55 years of age; employees of the state, commune, etc., for whom other provisions have already been made, but only in case their pension is higher than the lowest provided by the law. A number of other classes of employees are also exempt.

The obligation to insure begins at the end of the 18th year. The insured are divided into six classes, according to their annual salaries which range from 600 kr. ($121.80), for the lowest class, to over 3,000 kr. ($699) for the highest class. Allowances, gratuities, etc., are included in the total income. The premiums paid monthly for the six classes range from 6 kr. ($1.22) to 30 kr. ($6.09). The employer pays two-thirds of the premium in the four lower classes and one-half of the premium in the two higher classes. In case of an annual income over 7,200 kr. ($1,461.60), the employee has to pay the whole premium himself.

An old age pension is paid, in the case of insured men, either after 40 years of contribution at any age, or may be paid after 5 years of contribution on reaching the age of 70. In case of women, only 35 years of contributions are required, when the age of 55 has been reached, or after 5 years of contribution after reaching the age of 65. The amount of the pension varies with the salaried classes and the number of contributions made. The pension ranges from 180 kr. ($36.54) for the lowest class, to 270 kr. ($54.81) the second class; 360 kr. ($73.08) the third class; 540 kr. ($109.62) the fourth class; 720 kr. ($146.16) the fifth class, and 900 kr. ($182.70) for the sixth class. The reduced pension amounts to two-thirds of the fixed one. Pensions of half the amounts are also paid to the widows of insured persons, who drew an invalidity or old age pension during their lives or have acquired a right to such a pension.

The administration is under a central pension institution and its local offices. In 1911 there were 108,311 persons insured in Austria.

The State also has a compulsory old age pension fund for the government mining employees which was established in 1854. The State pays one-half of the contributions to that fund.

CHILE.

In February 1911, a law was passed in Chile requiring state railroads to establish a savings fund for the retirement of incapacitated salaried employees and workmen and for the compensation of persons injured in the service.

The fund is constituted (1), by deducting 5 per cent. from the employees' wages; (2) by retention of the first monthly increase in pay; (3) by the accumulation of fines and penalties, unclaimed pay, etc., and (4) by adding 54.8 cents out of every $365 of receipts.

Office employees who have been in the service for 10 years and who are completely incapacitated for work, may be retired with as many fourtieths of 75 per cent. of earnings as their years in service. Day laborers employed in the maintenance of ways, etc., having ten years of service and totally incapacitated for work may be retired with 50 per cent. of wages. Persons engaged in the upkeep of rolling stock, 65 years of age, 30 years in the service and incapacitated for work, retire with 50 per cent. of wages. The year's work must be of not less than 250 days.

Persons permanently incapacitated because of accident are compensated by the payment of full wages.

FRANCE.

After experiences with voluntary and subsidized insurance schemes lasting for more than half a century, France in 1910 was the first country to follow Germany's example in adopting a national compulsory system of old age insurance. Since its first enactment it has been amended several times, chiefly by the acts of September 30th, 1912; August 17th, and December 25, 1915. The present law provides that all workers (salaried or wage-earners) earning less than 3,000 francs ($579), must take out old age insurance. State employees who do not come under the regulations of civil and military pensions are also required to insure themselves. The law has also exempted several large industrial groups who were already protected by more liberal compulsory provisions. The insuring of a person may begin from the age of 12.

The contributions are of three kinds, depending upon the age or the sex of the insured person. Adult males pay 9 francs ($1.34) per year; adult females 6 francs ($1.16) per year; and minors under 18 years of age pay four and one-half francs ($0.87). The employer is required to duplicate this contribution and is also made responsible for the entire payment of the premium. He is permitted to deduct the worker's share from his wages, and receipts it by a system of special stamps which are affixed to the employer's card.

The age when one may be pensioned is 65. Pensions, however, may be drawn at 55 with a proportionate deduction in both the amount of pension and the state subsidy. The amount of a pension is based upon the number of contributions made and the age of the insured. In order to obtain a regular pension, 30 payments are required. This is reduced to 28 for all men who have performed at least two years of military service; and in the case of women, one annual payment for the birth of each child is deducted from the required thirty years. The State adds to each regular pension 100 francs ($19.30). This is still more increased by one-tenth to those persons, of either sex, who shall have brought up at least three children to the age of 16. For those who have made less than thirty payments but more than fifteen, the state subsidy is computed on a basis of 3.33 francs ($0.64) for each year of contribution. No state subsidy is given in cases of less than 15 annual payments.

To meet the immediate problem of relief for the aged, the law of 1910 also provided that all persons who were already 35 years of age, at the time the law was passed, must insure. To those between the ages of 35 and 40, the regular state subsidy was given. If 46 years old, in 1910, the subsidy was raised 2 francs and thereafter it was raised two francs for every additional year at which insurance began. Those over 65 years of age at the time the law went into effect, were continued to be given pensions in accordance with previous laws.

The number of persons insured under this act in 1913 was 7,854,132. The income for that year was 45,525,540 francs ($8,786,429). The total number of persons pensioned in 1912 was 640,532.

In addition to the compulsory insurance system, the French law also provides a system of voluntary insurance which is extended to private persons with small incomes, small employers of labor, peasant proprietors, independent workingmen, and wage earners with incomes of more than 3,000 francs ($579), but less than 5,000 francs ($965). The act of December 25, 1915, raised the maximum life annuity from 1,200 to 2,400 francs ($231.60—$463.20).

An Autonomous Pension Fund for miners was created by the act of February 25, 1914, which repealed the previous legislation on this matter. For the purpose of forming a basic capital for these pensions, the act provided that the mine owners pay every month into the fund 4 per cent. of the wages of the workers. The regular contribution is borne one-half by the employers and one-half by the workers. The right to a pension begins at 55 years of age. Miners who can prove that they have worked for wages for at least 30 years or at least 7,920 days, (absence on account of sickness is not deducted), in French mines, have the right, in addition, to a state allowance of 100 francs and a bonus from a special fund. In case of permanent incapacity a miner is entitled to a pension regardless of age.

The Act of June 5, 1915, introduced the use of "social insurance books" (livret d'assurances sociales) for persons who at the same time as they insure themselves for a pension in the National Old Age Pension Fund, wish to arrange for their dependents to receive a sum down upon their death.

GERMANY.

Old age insurance was first established in Germany in 1889. Since 1911 the system of old age insurance constitutes a component part of the German system of workingmen's insurance, which includes besides the payment of old age pensions, sickness, accident, invalidity and survivors benefits. The German law provides that all persons whose annual income does not exceed 2,000 marks ($476), must insure. The obligation to insure begins with the 17th year. Public employes, otherwise provided for, are exempt from insurance.

Prior to 1916, the age of eligibility for an old age pension was set at 70 years. An Imperial law of June 12, 1916, reduced this age from 70 to 65 years. This law was made retroactive taking effect as from the First of January, 1916. In addition to the old age pension, the German system also provides for an invalidity pension granted in case of permanent disability before the pensionable age. The latter is given to all persons unable to earn one-third of the normal wages in the same occupation and locality. As would be presumed, many more persons are receiving invalidity rather than old-age pensions. The former has steadily increased while the latter has steadily declined. In 1914, there were 998,339 invalidity pensions paid, as compared with 87,261 old age pensions. The comparative growth and decline of the two forms of pensions may be seen from the following: In 1891 there were 31 invalidity pensions; this increased to 405,335 in 1900; in 1908 it rose to 868,086, and in 1914 it numbered 998,339. The aggregate expenditures for the old age and invalidity pensions stood as one to two in 1894; it reversed to two to one in 1900, 8 to one in 1908, and 11 to one in 1912. The reduction of the pensionable age from 70 to 65, doubtless, reduced this proportion considerably. The consequences of this reduction for the first complete year, during which it was enforced, may be seen from the following figures: It is stated (Deutscher Reichsanzeiger, 6th, Feb. 1918), that the number of new pensions granted by the insurance offices of the various states increased from 11,276 in 1915 to 92,120 in 1916. Those granted by other offices of a special nature rose ten-fold in the same interval.*

The expense of insurance in Germany is borne jointly by the state, the employers and the employees. The state, besides bearing the expenses of administration and of the payment of pensions—through the postoffices—contributes, in addition, a fixed sum each year toward every pension. The amount of the weekly premium is paid by the employer and employees in equal parts. The employer is also made responsible for the insurance of all of his employees and for the payment of their premiums. He is permitted to deduct the latter's contributions from their wages, and receipts it by fixing special stamps to the worker's receipt cards.

The contributions are not uniform but vary in accordance with the annual earnings of the workers. For this purpose, the insured persons are divided into five classes ranging from those earning less than 350 marks ($83.37) per year, in the first class, to those earning more than 1,150 marks ($273.93) per year in the fifth class. Until 1917, the weekly contribution for these classes ranged from 16 pfennige ($0.038) to 48 pfennige ($0.114) per week. On January 1st, 1917, however, owing to the extra sums expended as a result of the reduction in the age limit, the contributions were increased to 18 pfennige per week for the first class, and 50 pfennige per week for the highest group.

In order to be eligible for an old age pension, one must have made at least 1,200 weekly contributions. To meet the immediate problem of old age relief the required number of contributions was reduced by 40 weeks for each year of age over 40 at the time the law became operative. Persons over 70 years of age at the time of the passage of the law were thus pensioned outright.

The amount of the old age pension ranges from 110 marks ($26.20) per year, to 230 marks ($54.79) per year, according to the wage class the insured person is in. The government's contribution consists of a uniform state subsidy of 50 marks ($11.91) to all pensioners. The lowest annuity granted is 60 marks ($14.29) for the first wage class. This is increased by steps of 30 marks ($7.15) for each succeeding class until it reaches 230 marks ($54.79).

The German system, in addition to paying pensions, makes also an effort to prevent invalidity whenever possible. The invalidity institute has the power to provide a course of medical treatment, such as would reduce or prevent the loss of earning power. For this purpose, a chain of 65 or more sanatoria are maintained, which treat annually about 70,000 persons. It is claimed that 80 per cent. of the cases treated are discharged as cured. The institutes are also authorized to invest part of their reserve in such manner as will promote the social welfare of the working classes. In order to improve the health and well being of the insured persons, the institutes have erected model dwellings for workmen, as well as convalescent homes, people's baths, labor colonies, etc. The insurance institutes claim that this has resulted in a considerable reduction in the death rate and sickness rate in Germany.

The invalidity and old age insurance system is administered by approximately 50 territorial and special "institutes" under the general supervision of the central insurance office. The administration is in the hands of highly trained experts. To each insurance office are attached several boards of arbitration which adjudicate cases in dispute. These consist of a president and vice-president and two representatives of both employers and employees. In 1914, the total cost of administration of the insurance system was 24,156,658 marks ($5,754,116).

The average amount of old age pensions in 1914 was 167.99 marks ($40.02) or about $3.33 per month. Because of the steady rise in wages which decreased the number of persons in the lower wage groups, the average pension paid has risen steadily. In 1891 it amounted to 124 marks ($29.54). In 1900 it was $34.67, and in 1908 it was $39.58. The average amount of this invalidity pension, increased from $41.60 in 1909 to $46.51 in 1913. In 1913 the number of persons insured under the invalidity and old age insurance was 16,323,800. This represented 24.4 per cent. of the total population. From 1891 to 1913 the distribution of the contributions towards the invalidity and old age pensions was as follows: The employers contributed $418,026,865, representing 40.7 per cent. of the total contributions. The insured persons contributed a similar sum. The aggregate state subsidy during this period amounted to $191,981,177, which represented 18.6 per cent. of the total contributions. The total contributions for the 22 years amounted to $1,028,034,907.

On January 1st, 1913, the act creating the salaried employees' insurance system came into operation. This was primarily for the payment of old age and survivors pensions. A waiting period of ten and five years respectively, for the payment of such benefits, is provided, but this period may be shortened by the payment of extra premiums. Under this insurance institute, pensions are paid if the earning capacity of the insured has been lessened by 50 per cent. The contributions here are made by the employers and employees with no state subsidy. During the year 1916, the total amount of contributions paid to the institute by the employers and employees, was in round figures 113,000,000 marks ($26,894,600). This insurance system is very unpopular, as during the same year the obligation to insure was contested by many people. While only few pensions were given during the year 1916, the insurance institute for salaried employees granted such other benefits as provided by law. First of these was the granting of medical and curative treatments. The institute is objected to by many, as it is claimed, that its creation was mainly for political reasons, in order to separate the salaried employees from wage-workers, as a special class.

GREECE.

A compulsory invalidity and old age insurance system for Greek sailors was enacted in 1907. The cost is divided equally between the insured, the employers and the state.*

ICELAND.

A compulsory system of old age and invalidity insurance was established in Iceland as early as 1890. The act provides that "All servants between the ages of 20 and 60, all day laborers, and persons working with their parents must annually contribute to this fund $0.27 for men, and $0.08 for women. The male head of each house hold must pay this contribution for every person who resided with him during the year, but he may deduct it from the wages of his employees. For non-payment of these contributions, property may be attached. The only persons exempt from paying contributions are those without means who are responsible for maintaining one or more dependents who are unable to provide for themselves; those unable to earn wages on account of sickness or other causes; and those who have provided for their old age by purchase of an annuity of at least 150 kroner ($40.20).

"Pensions are granted to persons over 60 years of age who have received no poor relief during a prior period of ten years. The minimum pension is 20 kroner ($5.36) and the maximum pension granted may not exceed 200 kroner ($53.60).

"Funds are administered in cities by the magistrates, in rural communities by the parish council, and these officials may set aside as their salaries, 4 per cent. of all contributions levied. They must also elect two persons who audit the annual balance sheet of the respective funds."

LUXEMBURG.

Luxemburg first established a compulsory system of old age and invalidity insurance in 1911-12. The act provided that all persons earning not less than 3,000 marks ($715) annually must insure. Persons earning not more than 3,600 marks ($858) may, in addition, take out voluntary insurance.

*Report of Special Inquiry Relative to Aged and Dependent Persons in Massachusetts, 1916, p. 102.

The law also provides for institutional care to prevent incapacity and provides for the care of widows and dependents in case of death. The pensionable age was first set at 68 but an amendment, passed in June 1914, reduced it to 65 and provided that, "Any insured Luxemburg subject who has completed his sixty-fifth year of age, and who proves that he has worked in the Duchy for at least 2,700 days in an occupation subject to compulsory insurance, shall be entitled to an old age pension." Also "Luxemburg subjects who on 1st January, 1912, are sixty-five years of age or more, and who prove that during the five years which immediately preceded this date they have regularly exercised in the Grand Duchy an occupation subject to compulsory insurance, shall be entitled to claim one-third of original pension." And further, "Insured Luxemburg subjects who have completed the sixty-fifth year of their age within ten years immediately following 1st January 1912 . . . shall be entitled to old age pensions, if they give proof that during the five years immediately preceding 1st January, 1912, they have regularly exercised in the Grand Duchy an occupation subject to compulsory insurance, and that since that date up to the completion of their sixty-fifth year they have worked on an average 270 days a year."*

As in Germany, the state, the employers, and the employees bear the expenses of the pension. The state subsidy amounts to a fixed sum of 48 marks ($11.43) for every insured man and 38.40 marks ($9.15) for every insured woman. For this purpose, the Act of 1914 sets aside a credit of 125,000 francs to be paid annually for 50 years, to the deposit of the Invalidity and Old Age Insurance Institution. The total contribution of the employers and employees is at the rate of 2.1 per cent. of the wages earned. This is divided equally between the employer and the employee. The former was made responsible for the payment of the premiums, by the Act of 1911, and was authorized to deduct the employee's share from the wages. The Act of 1914 modified this, so that by mutual agreement, the retention of deductions corresponding to the contributions due, may be postponed until the final settlement, (this to be not later than December 31, of each year); and the share of contributions of agricultural workers, working partly on their own account and partly for others, shall be collected direct from such persons. The amendment also provides that the Managing Committee of the Insurance Institution may require a security to be deposited by contractors domiciled in a foreign country, who temporarily employ in the Grand Duchy persons liable to insurance.

The contributions to this fund in 1912 were as follows: from industrial and miscellaneous occupations, 1,339,000 francs, and from agricultural, 53,777 francs. The benefits paid out during the fiscal year, 1912-13, were 29,464 francs to the industrial and miscellaneous occupations and 16,045 francs to agricultural workers.

NETHERLANDS.

By an act passed on the 5th of June, 1913, a system of old age and invalidity insurance was established in the Netherlands. It provides for compulsory insurance of all workmen in the Netherlands over 13 years of age, who are not in active military service, and whose annual income does not exceed 1,200 florins ($482). This Act also applies to seamen and workmen employed in a foreign country by Netherlands establishments. The law exempts from compulsory insurance those who work for wages by way of exception and for short periods; those already entitled to a pension from the state or private establishments; and those who pay a property or an income tax exceeding 2,000 florins. The government, it is also provided, is to pay an annual subsidy to the insurance fund of 10,000,000 florins ($4,020,000), for a period of 75 years. Prior to 1914, the government also paid to the districts a subsidy of 50 florins ($20.10) per pension.

The insurance entitles the workmen to an annuity in the event of disablement or after the completion of his 70th year of age. Incapacity is defined as the inability to earn one-third of the normal wage. In case of death the surviving children receive annuities until the age of 13. In order to be eligible for an invalidity annuity, every insured person must have paid 150 premiums. After the age of 70, a person is entitled to an old age annuity. Persons convicted of crime, recipients of public charity and those of immoral character are disqualified from a pension. It is also required that one must have been a resident of the country for at least 20 years and a citizen for at least 5 years before he is entitled to a pension.

Persons subject to compulsory insurance are divided into five classes in accordance with the wages earned. These range from the first class—those earning less than 240 florins ($96.48), to those earning 900 ($36.80) or more florins. The weekly premiums paid vary from 20 cts. ($0.08) for the first class to 48 cts. ($0.193) per week in the fifth class. The premium is paid by the employer who is entitled to deduct from the weekly wages a sum ranging from 4 cts. for the first wage class, to 24 cts., in the fifth wage group in the case of adults, and half the amount of the premium for each wage class in the case of minors. The employers bear a greater share in the lower wage groups and bear an equal amount in the case of the upper wage classes. Military conscripts, while in service, are assigned to the second wage class and their premiums are paid by the State.

The amount of the annuity is computed as follows: The pension amounts to 325 times the total of the premiums paid up, which is divided by the number of the weeks during which the person has been insured. To this is added 14 per cent. of the total amount of the premium paid up, which must not be less than one-fifth of the original pensions. "In accordance with this formula an insured person who has paid 48 weekly contributions each year, from the age of 20 to the age of 70, and whose wages were $5 a week up to the age of 25, $6 a week up to the age of 30, $7 a week thereafter would be entitled to a pension of about $2.30 a week at the age of 70. In the event of his becoming incapacitated at the age of 30, he would from that time onward receive about $1.25 a week. Should such incapacity not occur until his 40th year, he would receive about $1.50 a week, and if it did not occur until his 50th year, he would receive about $1.80 a week."*

The act also provides that in cases of persons subject to compulsory insurance, if permanent disability may be averted by medical treatment, the "Labor Council" may cause such insured persons to be subjected to such treatment or placed in a nursing institution at the expense of the State Insurance Bank.

Besides the compulsory insurance system, Netherland also provides a system of voluntary insurance for those exempted under the first system against invalidity and old age.

NORWAY.

In February 1907, a Commission was appointed in Norway to study the problem of invalidity and old age insurance. The Commission finished its work in 1912, and submitted a draft of a bill for a national invalidity and old age insurance system. This bill proposed that all male and female persons residing in Norway or belonging to the crews of Norwegian vessels, Norwegian citizens in Norwegian employment in foreign countries and Norwegian citizens employed by foreign countries in Norway, shall be compelled to insure themselves against invalidity and old age. The insurance to begin from the age of 16 years.

The proposed scheme provides for the payment of an invalidity pension—invalidity existing when the earning power is reduced to less than one-third the normal—after four years of contributions and after a waiting period of 26 weeks from the time of the invalidity. If a person earns 1,500 crowns ($402) a year, he is not to be considered disabled under any conditions. The old age pension matures at 70 years. An invalidity pension ceases as soon as an old age pension is drawn. Medical and institutional care is also provided in the proposed bill.

The bill proposed that the cost of the administration of the insurance should be borne by the state and the commune; the cost of the insurance proper, however, to be met by the contributions of the insured persons. In addition, it is suggested that the commune pay 25 crowns ($6.70) annually for every current invalidity pension. During the time of sickness or accident, the commune also to pay the contributions in case the insured person is unable to pay them himself.

The contributions are to be paid for 50 years, but persons over 70 years of age are exempt from payments. Contributions are to be 2 per cent. of the earnings but not less than two crowns ($0.54) a year. A fraction of one per cent. on the property of an insured person is added to the contribution. A deduction of 5 per cent. from the contribution is made for each dependent of the insured person. No child over 14, however, is to be considered dependent.

The bill proposes a rather unique system of computing the amounts of the pensions. The framers of the bill assumed that, "On the coming into force of the insurance, the sums at present expended for public and private poor relief, which are raised by taxation, will decrease considerably. This should result in a saving to persons who for some reasons or other are exempt from insurance, and also to corporations, foundations, and societies, the income of which is subject to special taxation. If such individuals and incorporated bodies do not give some equivalent for this saving, they would actually obtain an advantage at the expense of the insured persons because expenditures which would otherwise be borne by all persons subject to taxation would in such a case be borne exclusively by the insured persons. Since the national insurance system does not intend to bring about such a shifting of the social burden, the bill provides that all persons who have ceased to pay regular contributions, all persons who are not subject to insurance, and all taxable corporations, foundations, and societies, the income of which has not been taxed in the assessment on their stockholders, partners, or members, must pay to the national insurance institution an equivalent for their saving in taxes, the amount of which shall be determined on the basis of statistical computations." It is therefore, provided that the total fund, in addition to the regular contributions, shall consist also of the insured person's savings in poor relief and private support, as well as the current invalidity subsidy of the commune. In order to make the pension uniform, a basic pension of somewhat more than 53 crowns ($14.20) per year is, therefore, to be paid to the insured person regardless of the amounts of the premiums paid. The basic pension is increased in accordance with the number of contributions made, the economic conditions, and the number of the dependents of the insured person. An additional grant of 15 crowns ($4.02) is given for every child under 14. If both husband and wife are receiving a pension, 20 crowns ($5.36) for every child under the age of 14, is granted.

Contributions are to be collected along with the Communal taxes. The employers are to pay the contributions of their employes, as well as those of their employes' families. The employer may deduct the cost from his employe's wages. If the pension granted by the usual method of computation is too small, the commune may grant an increase.*

ROUMANIA.

An act passed in 1912, established a compulsory old age and invalidity insurance system in Roumania. This act was modeled after the German and French systems. It defines invalidity in the same manner as is defined by the German act. A person becomes eligible to an old age pension at the age of 65. Like the French system the contributions are made uniform for all classes. For the first ten years from the date the act becomes effective, the amounts of the weekly contributions are set at 45 bani ($0.87). This is divided equally among the employer, employe and the State. The employer is made responsible for the entire payment of his own and his worker's contributions, but may deduct the latter's share from the wages.

In order to be eligible for a pension, contributions for at least 12 weeks must have been made. The regular old age pension amounts to 150 lei ($28.95). The invalidity pension is paid to the insured person after 16 weeks of consecutive illness. The latter is increased by 10 bani ($0.02) for every weekly contribution in excess of 2,000.

RUSSIA.

There was no general provision for invalidity and old age insurance in Russia. Those provided with such protection included the various government employes who, however, covered a considerable field. An old age pension fund granting pensions after 25 years of service to employes of State mines was established as early as 1797. In 1804 this was extended to all employes of State factories.

Before the revolution, there were several separate State funds in existence which required employes of the particular industries to participate. The State Miners Fund paid pensions after 35 years of service, and required all over 18 years of age, engaged for at least one year in the work, to become members of the fund. The Railroad Employees Pension Fund required all employes of State and private railroads to insure themselves. A pension was paid after 15 years of service. A similar fund existed for the employes of the State Liquor Monopoly. A separate savings fund for old age also existed for the workers of factories and harbor works operated by the ministry of marine. Another fund against old age was operated for the members of the volunteer fleet. A compulsory contributory pension fund was also established for all the employes of the Zemstvos. Practically all these funds were controlled by the members of the particular funds.

In 1914 the government's contribution to these funds amounted to 117,994 roubles ($60,694).

SWEDEN.

In 1913, Sweden enacted a compulsory system of old age insurance which is more comprehensive than any of those in existence. Instead of limiting it to certain wage groups as is the case in most other countries, it is made universal in so far as it provides that every Swedish man or woman above the age of 16 years is subject to compulsory insurance, until the completion of his or her 66th year. The law exempts only persons who are permanently incapacitated for work; state employes already provided with pensions; elementary school teachers; members of the army and navy, ministers of religion and the wives of persons thus exempted.

The contribution is paid from the 16th year by every man and woman in the form of an annual tax or premium amounting to three crowns ($0.80). This contribution is increased by two crowns for incomes over 500 to 800 crowns; the surtax is increased by 5 crowns for incomes from 800 to 1,200 crowns and by 10 crowns for incomes of 1,200 crowns and over. The law provides that the annual contribution payable by each person shall be collected by the commune in which the person is registered. The commune is also bound to account, and pay into the fund an amount corresponding to the contributions that may not have been paid. The wife's contribution is to be paid by her husband. And the father is responsible for such pension contributions for children under 18 years who are registered as residents in his house. Should the employer pay a contribution on behalf of his employes, he may retain the sum disbursed out of the wages paid, within six months of such payment.

The insurance benefit consists in an invalidity pension in the case of permanent incapacity for work, regardless of age, and in an old age pension on attaining 67 years of age, even if incapacity has not yet set in. The amount of the pension for men is 30 per cent. of the total pension contributions paid, and for women, 24 per cent. It is also provided that pensioners permanently incapacitated for work, whose annual income does not exceed 50 crowns ($13.40), receive in addition to their pension out of the Exchequer 150 crowns ($40.20) per annum per man and 140 crowns ($37.52) per woman. This subsidy decreases to one-half if the pensioner's income is over 50 crowns ($13.40), and ceases altogether when the income amounts to 300 crowns ($80.40) per man or 280 crowns ($75.04) per woman. In the event of fully paid up pension contributions, the pension addition is increased by .08 per cent. for every crown paid. The pension additions are borne to the extent of three-quarters of the amount by the State, while the remainder is divided between the Landsting and the communes.

Pensions are not given to those in receipt of poor relief or to habitual drunkards and idlers. If institutional care is given, the institution may claim the right to the pension in order to reimburse itself to the amount charged for the care of the pensioner. Imprisonment or conviction for more than one month stops the receipt of a pension during that time. It may be claimed, however, by the dependents for their support.

The law also provides that in order to become entitled to a higher pension than that provided for in the act, every Swedish subject who has reached the age of 15, may, by paying contributions not to exceed 30 crowns ($8.04) per annum become entitled to a higher pension. To all voluntary contributions paid within each year, an amount equal to one-eighth of the contributions, is added by the government. The amount of the pension being one and one-half per cent. of the voluntary contribution in the case of a man, and one-sixth less than that, in the case of a woman. The administration of the insurance is under a pension committee, the chairman of which is appointed by the king's representative—one for every pension district in the country—while the six members and their substitutes are elected by the communes.

To meet the immediate problem of old-age relief, a provision stipulates that, for persons who during the years 1914 up to and including 1918, have acquired the right of an addition to their pension or support, or to an increase thereof, this benefit is to be calculated as from 50 to 90 per cent. of the sums otherwise provided in the act; and for persons who when the act comes into force, are between the ages of 25 and 45 years, 27.5 to 20 per cent. for men or 22 to 16 per cent. for women, of the contributions paid. The increased cost is borne by the government.

The number of pensions granted under this law in 1914 was 33,138. The amount paid was 1,875,457 crowns ($502,622), which was an average pension of 56.6 crowns ($15.17). It is also shown that pensions were granted to 10,565 men with a total of 623,120 crowns ($166,396) or 58.98 crowns ($15.81) per capita; 22,573 pensions were granted to women amounting to 1,252,336 crowns ($335,625) or 55.48 crowns ($14.87) per capita. In 1914, the total number of persons insured under this act was 3,225,700. The contributions of the pensioners amounted to a total of 14,571,000 crowns ($3,965,028). The number of voluntary cases insured in 1914 was 628.

SWITZERLAND.

The National Assembly of the Swiss Canton of Glarus introduced a system of State old age and invalidity insurance in the Canton by the Act of the 17th of May, 1916. Insurance is compulsory for all persons between 17 and 50 years of age who have their legal domicile in the Canton. Persons who remove to another Canton may remain in insurance by paying an increased annual contribution; persons who settle abroad leave the insurance, but if they return to Switzerland within four years they may re-enter the insurance by paying an increased contribution for the period of their absence.

The funds are raised: (1) by an annual contribution from the Canton of 85,000 frs., together with the interest from the Old Age and Invalidity Insurance Fund and other associations; (2) by an annual contribution from the Communes of 1 fr. per head of the population; (3) by an annual contribution of 6 frs from each insured person. The obligation to pay contributions ceases on reaching the age of 65. The annual contributions may be commuted by making a single payment ranging from 125 frs. at the age of 17 to 470 frs. at the age of 49. Disablement pensions are payable to persons who, having been insured for five years, become incapable of work on account of illness or other infirmities for at least one year, regardless of their age. Old age pensions are payable from the age of 65. The right to draw an old age pension is conditional upon the insured person having paid altogether at least 400 frs. (i. e., 33 years' contributions plus interest), otherwise the pension is reduced accordingly.

The amount of the annual invalidity pension begins at 150 frs. and increases annually by 10 frs., up to a maximum of 300 frs. for men and 250 frs. for women. The amount of the annual old age pension is:

	Men.	Women.
At the beginning of the 66th year	180 fcs.	140 fcs.
At the beginning of the 67th year	210 fcs.	160 fcs.
At the beginning of the 68th year	240 fcs.	180 fcs.
At the beginning of the 69th year	270 fcs.	210 fcs.
At the beginning of the 70th year & upward	300 fcs.	250 fcs.

A claim to a pension lapses if the insured person takes up his residence abroad after beginning to draw his pension; in this case the person concerned may demand the reimbursement, without interest, of the contributions he has paid. The insurance is effected through the State Old Age and Invalidity Insurance Institution. Special provisions regulate voluntary insurance, to which persons of from one to 17 years of age may be admitted.*

There are also in Switzerland a large number of special funds with definitely restricted membership, such as the employees of the federal railways and of the post-office department. Membership here is made compulsory. The contributions are borne jointly by the insured persons and the federal government.

III. NON-CONTRIBUTORY OR STRAIGHT OLD AGE PENSION SCHEMES.

ALASKA.

The Legislature of the Territory of Alaska in 1915 passed an act providing that, "Any pioneer of Alaska, regardless of sex, who has attained the age of sixty-five (65) years and shall have resided in Alaska for ten consecutive years or more since the year 1905, and is entitled to the benefits of the Pioneers' Home at Sitka, Alaska, or of the Home for Indigent Pioneers at Fairbanks or elsewhere in Alaska (should the same be established) may in lieu of an application to be received and cared for at such home, make an application to the Board of Trustees of said Alaska Pioneers' Home, for an allowance to be paid out of the revenue of said Home; and thereupon said Board shall investigate the case of such applicant, and if they find that his or her case is worthy, and that he or she is in actual need of such allowance, the said trustees shall enroll him or her as a beneficiary of said Home . . . and in conformity therewith, an allowance shall be paid for his or her use as provided in Section three and four of this Act . . . Provided, that if any person pensioned under the provisions of this act, shall be admitted, to the Alaska Pioneers' Home or other Territorial Institutions, any pension granted hereunder shall be suspended during the time such person shall be an inmate of any such Territorial Institution, nor shall any pension be paid to any person who has been absent from the Territory of Alaska for a period not to exceed one year."

The original bill provided for allowances not to exceed $12.50 per month in any case. This was amended in the 1917 session so that as the law stands now: "Each allowance granted shall be of such amount not exceeding twelve dollars and fifty cents ($12.50) per month, as said Board of Trustees in their discretion shall allow and be specified in the certificate having due regard to the necessities of the applicant; provided that in the case of extreme emergency the Board may in its discretion, make a maximum allowance to pioneer women, who shall be sixty years of age and otherwise qualified to receive such allowance according to the provisions of this Act, in the sum of twenty-five ($25.00) dollars, per month . . . and after being granted shall not be diminished in amount, but may be from time to time increased by said Board to an amount not exceeding said maximum. Provided, however, in case the Board of Trustees shall be satisfied that the beneficiary is in position to support himself or herself, or can be supported by his or her relatives, the Board may revoke the grant of an allowance, cancel the beneficiary's certificate, and strike his or her name from the roll of the beneficiaries."

The Legislature in 1917 also provided that, "the sum of thirty thousand dollars or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the purposes of this act; . . . provided that the Board of Trustees shall not grant allowances calling for an expenditure in excess of fifteen thousand dollars in any one year; and further provided, that any excess fund not issued the first year shall be available for use the following year."

ARIZONA.

At least one State in the Union, Arizona, enacted in 1915 by initiative petition and popular vote legislation granting old age pensions. These are given to all needy citizens of the United States who have been residents of the State of Arizona for at least five years prior to application therefore and who have reached at least 60 years of age. The pension amounts to $15.00 per month and is given so long as the pensioner continues to live in the State. This act had been held unconstitutional by the Superior Court of Arizona, in November, 1915, and an appeal was then taken to the Supreme Court of the State.

AUSTRALIA.

The Australian old age invalidity act was passed on June 10, 1908, and became effective July 1st, 1909. This act supersedes the previous old age pension systems established by the separate States of New South Wales, Queensland and Victoria. The new law which was amended in some essential respects in December 1912, applies to the entire Commonwealth, including the States of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, West Australia, Queensland and Tasmania.

The law provides for the granting of pensions to all males over 65 years of age and females above the age of 60. Pensions are given to persons who have been residents of Australia for at least 25 years. They must also be of good character and not to have been imprisoned for four months within 5 years in the last 25 years. Pensions are refused to claimants who are wife-deserters, drunkards, etc., and are not given to those who own property above £310 ($1,500). The law also excludes from the pension right, Asiatics or aboriginal natives of Australia, Africa, New Zealand or the Islands of the Pacific.

In addition to the old age pension the Australian act also provides for an invalidity pension payable to any person above 16 years of age, who is permanently incapacitated for work, provided that the person shall have resided in Australia for at least 5 years. The claimant for an invalidity pension must also have no claim upon an employer for accident compensation and not to have property or income in excess of the pension amount. The act of 1912 also specifies that gifts or allowances given to a pensioner by children, grandchildren and relatives, etc., are not included in the income. The above act also made naturalized citizens entitled to pensions from the time of their naturalization, instead of after three years of waiting, as was required previously. The law also provided that permanently incapacitated persons should include the permanently blind. By the Acts of Nov. 1912 and Dec. 1914, the government of Australia set aside a credit of three million, and five and one-half million pounds respectively, for the purpose of the invalidity and old age pension funds.

No uniform or fixed pension amount is provided. The law specifies that the amount of pension shall be "at such rate as, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, the commission who determines the pension claim deems reasonable and sufficient." The pension must not exceed, however, £26 ($127) per year. And no pension may be paid of such amount as to bring the pensioner's total income above £52 ($250) per year. Where the pensioner has property, the pension is reduced to the extent of one pound ($4.87) for every ten pounds ($48.70) of the net property exceeding 50 pounds ($243) exclusive of the home, or above £100 ($487) including the home. When both husband and wife are pensioners, deduction in case of each of them shall be one pound for every 10 pounds of net property above 25 pounds.

DENMARK.

Just as Germany was the pioneer in the establishment of compulsory old age insurance, so was Denmark the pioneer in instituting a state non-contributory or straight pension system for the aged people. The main object of the Danish system was to assist respectable old persons to maintain themselves without becoming paupers and thus forfeiting their civil rights. The public authority is required to help anyone so long as he cannot provide for himself or for his dependents. Pensions in old age were inaugurated in Denmark as early as 1891.

The law provides that all persons upon reaching the age of 60 are entitled to a pension. The conditions of eligibility, however, are numerous, and rather vague in some respects while rigorous in others. The claimant to a pension must prove that he is unable to provide the necessities of life for himself or his dependents. One cannot receive a pension if he has ever been convicted of a crime, unless subsequently restored to civil rights. The claimant must also not have squandered his means. He must not have received poor relief, except medical aid during the 5 years prior to his application for a pension. A pensioner must also be a Danish subject and a resident of at least 10 years in a fixed locality prior to application.

The law specifies no fixed rules for the amounts of the relief to be granted. It provides that the relief given and the pensioner's other income, "must be sufficient for the person relieved and for his family, and for the treatment in case of sickness." What is a sufficiency is decided by the local authorities. No account is taken of any income amounting to less than 100 kroner ($26.80) per year. The nature of the relief given may consist either of money or goods, such as food, fuel and rent. Usually, money grants are given in the cities, while the latter are given in the rural sections. Pensioners who are unable to care for themselves, are cared for in special homes, which are in the form of detached cottages, or in single large institutions. During the years 1911-12 three per cent. of the pensioners were cared for in these homes.

Pensions are continued until the conditions under which they were granted have changed. The pension is given to the head of the family, treating the family as a unit, and is larger for heads of the families than for individuals. In determining the amount of the pension, the former social conditions and manner of living are taken into consideration. Poor relief granted to the wife in the past is considered as poor relief granted to the husband.

The expenses of the old age relief are borne equally by the State and the communes. The pensions are administered by the municipal and communal authorities who employ well trained men for that purpose. The entire system is under the supervision of the Minister of the Interior, to whom all appeals from local authorities are taken.

Since the inauguration of the system, the number of pensioners has increased steadily. In 1902 the number of pensioners was 60,066; in 1908 it was 71,185, and in 1911 it was 79,340. Of the 79,340 pensioners in 1911, 16,710 or 21 per cent. were heads of families; 20,085 or 25 per cent. were dependents; 9,356 or 12 per cent. were single men and 33,034 or 2 per cent. were single women. The cost of the pensions has increased since the beginning of the system tremendously. In 1892 the amount spent on pensions was 2,600,000 kroner ($696,800) and in 1913-14 it amounted to 14,013,954 kroner ($3,755,740). This cost was divided about equally between the national government and the communes.

GREAT BRITAIN.

In England, the question of government provision against old age was in the foreground for half a century. The evils that were connected with the English Poor Law system are familiar to all. An attempt to relieve the problem of aged dependency, thru a system of voluntary savings and insurance, thru the post-offices, brought little success. Finally the British Old Age Pension Act was passed in 1908. Since then it was amended in several essentials.

The act of 1908 established a non-compulsory system of pensions thruout the United Kingdom. This law provided for the granting of an old age pension to all men and women, married or single, who are over 70 years of age. The qualifications specified are, that the claimant must be a resident of the United Kingdom for at least 20 years prior to his application. He must be a British subject. A naturalized British subject is eligible if he has been naturalized for twenty years, and has resided for the same period in the United Kingdom. Previous receipt of poor law relief or residence in a workhouse does not disqualify; but the receipt of poor relief, except medical aid, after the granting of a pension disqualifies the pensioner from a further pension. Paupers arriving at the age of 70, may if they choose, give up their outdoor relief or workhouse residence and receive an old age pension instead. The act also specifies that a pensioner must be so far of good character as not to have been a prisoner during the preceding ten years, and not to have habitually failed to work so that his wife and children became dependent on public funds. The act also disqualifies from a pension habitual drunkards, persons actually in prison or under detention as lunatics, as well as inmates of institutions, where the board and lodging amount to an income above the pensionable limit. The property qualifications are that the claimant's income must not exceed £31. 10s ($153) per annum.

The amount of the pension varies in accordance with the total income of the pensioner. The original act provided a maximum pension amount of 5s ($1.22) per week, for those whose annual income did not exceed £21 ($102). The pension is 4s if the pensioner's income is between £21 and £23; 3s if the income is between £23 and £26 a year; 2s when it is between £26 and £28, and 1s between £28 and £31 a year. Property yielding no income does not disqualify, but a house is reckoned at its rental value and savings in a bank is considered as if it were yielding 2½ per cent. interest. The incomes of husband and wife are added together and each is considered as possessing half the total. Regular allowances, gifts, etc., from friends, relatives, or charity organizations are included in the income. Pensions are paid to both husband and wife.

In 1917 the government decided, "in order to assist cases of distress among old age pensioners, that an additional allowance of a maximum of 2s 6d per week, should be paid to those pensioners who are suffering special hardship from the high prices of food and other economic conditions arising from the war."

The additional allowances are thus limited to cases of special hardship. These allowances are not granted also to members of infirmaries or institutions of the poor. The allowance is decreased if the pensioners means increase, and vice-versa. It was also understood that the additional allowances will only be payable during the continuance of the war, and may be withdrawn at any time the government so decides. During the war several other concessions were made by the British government to old age pensioners.

In 1909 the number of pensioners was 647,494. This increased to 987,238 at the close of the fiscal year 1914-15. According to the census of 1911, 624 out of every 1,000 persons of pensionable age in England and Wales, were receiving pensions. In other words, only 2 of every 5 persons, 70 years of age and over, in England and Wales, had an annual income of their own, amounting to at least £31 ($153). The expenditures on pensions increased from £8,077,110 ($39,307,259) for the year 1908-09 to £12,315,061 ($59,931,245) for the year 1913-14. In 1907, it is estimated, the amount reached into something like £18,000,000.

The old age pension act is administered by the Local Government Board, which operates thru local pension commissions and paid pension officers. In 1913 the cost of administering this system amounted to less than five cents for every dollar distributed.

A glance at the efficacy and the future prospects of the English Old Age Pension System, may perhaps be obtained from the following article, taken from the Local Government Chronicle of the issue of Oct. 27, 1917. "The Prime Minister, replying to a deputation from the Parliamentary Committee of the Scottish Trade Union Congress referred to the question of old age pensions, and said that he had no doubt the benevolence of the State would be developed and extended in the future, according not merely to its opportunities, but according to its means. When he introduced the Old Age Pension Bill they began by spending £8,000,000. The £8,000,000 grew to between £12,000,000 and £13,000,000, at the beginning of the war, and now the £13,000,000 had grown into something like £18,000,000. They now had 7s. 6d. for the old age pensioner, and they had 5s. for those who were incapacitated. That had made a difference which it was very difficult to reckon or to portray in words, in the lives of hundreds of thousands of poor old people who deserved well of the community. He hoped the State would go on extending and recognizing the obligations it owed to these people. He thought the worker in any rank of life ought to be able to claim as a matter of right from the community, the same security as the civil servant against indigence and squalor and misery when his strength had given out. The war had opened people's eyes. The sort of individual conflict which constituted almost the life of the nation before the war was merging into a sense of community and fraternity which had come from common trials and burdens and sorrows. He thought that after the war the country, shouldering the heavy burden of the war, would be in a better temper and a better frame of mind to consider every cause which was righteous, and the cause of the blind, the afflicted, the aged and the miserable amongst us were of that kind."

NEW ZEALAND.

New Zealand established a non-contributory old age pension system in 1898. Important amendments were made since, in 1905, 1912 and 1913. The New Zealand law grants a pension to all persons 65 years of age and over who have been residents of the colony for at least 25 years, and citizens for at least 3 years. It also provides that in order to be eligible for a pension, a pensioner must not have property exceeding £260, ($1,265), nor an income above £60 ($292) per year. In case of a married couple the joint income must not exceed £90 ($438). The law also disqualifies from a pension Chinese or other Asiatics, Maoris, and persons imprisoned for 4 months during the last 5 years. Pensions are also refused to deserters of wives and children, drunkards and persons leading irreputable lives.

The maximum amount of the annual pension is £26 ($127). One pound from the pension is deducted for every one pound of income over £34 ($165), and for every £10 ($48.70) of net property, in excess of £50 ($243). Income from property is not taken into consideration. It is also specified that a pensioner may retain a home to the value of £650 ($3,163), which shall revert to the colony at the death of pensioner. Parents' pensions, which are given to those having two or more children—and may be further given to the father at the age of 60 and the mother at the age of 55—may in certain circumstances be increased by a sum not to exceed £13 ($63) per year. The law also provides for care in institutions for those who are unable to maintain homes for themselves.

The pension system is administered by the Commissioner of Pensions and district Registrars, into which the colony is divided for this purpose. Pensions are awarded for one year only, but may be renewed.

The following table shows the steady increase in the number of pensioners and the cost of the scheme from its beginning in 1899 to 1916:

APPENDIX A.

SOME TYPICAL CASES OF MALADJUSTED AGED DEPENDENTS FOUND IN OUR INVESTIGATIONS.

(a) Cases Encountered in the House-to-House Studies in Philadelphia, Pittsburgh and Reading.

Mr. M. P. is 58 years old. A year ago he had a paralytic stroke and ever since that day he has not been able to work. Until a week ago, a trade union to which he belonged, had taken care of him and his sickly wife. However, according to the by-laws of the organization, benefits for sickness are only paid for one year. To go to the poor-house and be separated from each other was unthinkable to the still loving couple and so Mrs. P. is taking in washing and supporting the family.

W. H., 62 years of age, was a trolley motorman who lost his leg in an accident. The car company bought him an artificial leg and gave him a position as watchman which he had kept till about two years ago, when he was discharged. He then worked in a stocking factory. When the factory started on government work he again lost his job. When visited, his wife had been sick in bed for 9 weeks. His daughter-in-law is keeping the home together as best she can. She gave up her position in order to look after the old folks. In addition, she is also supporting her husband who is confined in a tuberculosis sanitarium.

Mr. H. is 68 years of age. Sixteen years ago he was hurt while at work at a well known Pittsburgh steel plant, which totally incapacitated him. His only son lost both of his legs at the same place. Not a cent was given to either the father or son. Now, in order to support his aged father and mother, the son begs on the streets.

Mrs. D. R. lives on Hope street, Philadelphia. She is past 60 in years and almost totally blind. She is still supporting her aged mother, 85 years of age. Hardly able to distinguish white from black she takes in washing and stands over a steaming tub of suds all day long in order to keep herself and her mother alive. She has three children living somewhere, but rarely hears from them.

J. E. past 70 years of age, was found to be taken care of by an old friend, a countryman of his from the other side of the water. On being questioned the Good Samaritan replied, "If he works and makes a few cents he pays me a little something, and if not, all right. I keep him just the same."

Eighteen years ago, before the compensation law went into effect, G. W. 72 years old, was injured in a locomotive plant. Being incapacitated for work he was dismissed from service without any provision for support. His wife then took up the burden of supporting and for a long time sold shoe laces on the streets to earn enough to keep herself and husband. She is now past 76 and is blind. Peddling on the streets is now also prohibited by law, and the two old people have nothing ahead of them except the poor-house.

Mrs. M., a widow, had not left her bed for three years. Her hip was fractured thru a fall on an icy pavement. Her age is 83. No person walks this earth whom she can call a relative, and she is depending upon the charity of strangers. Another old soul, verging on the brink of the great beyond, had taken Mrs. M. to her one room home and is sharing her bed and fireside with her. During the day the latter peddles and begs on the streets.

Mr. W. G. is 66 years old. He insists that he is "as fit as a fiddle." The employment agents, however, do not think so and for the past several months Mr. G. has been unable to find any kind of work on account of his age.

In the prime of his life, W. A. B., 63 years old, had worked in a paper mill. He had for the greater part of his life earned on an average $12.00 a week. He raised a family of three children on this salary. At present, his children are old enough to support themselves and W. A. B.'s pay envelope has, on account of war wages, fattened up to $23 a week.

Mrs. C. B., a widow of 72 years of age and not in good health, manages to earn about $3 a week, gathering fern leaves on the mountains for florists. A grandson of 17 works, when he can, to help out. Her daughter with whom she resides gives her food and medicine. For weeks at a stretch in the winter, the old woman is ill and unable to get about, but nevertheless, hates the idea of being dependent and endeavors to take in washing and do light work to earn what money she can to lighten her daughter's load.

C. R., age 71, was hurt at his work while cleaning the streets of Reading, Pa. His sister, who is a widow, keeps the house for him. She also goes out washing and with the money she earns, along with the $5 a week which C. R. gets from the Workmen's Compensation Insurance, they just manage to have enough to eat.

An old woman, born in Austria, has two sons in the army. She does not speak English. She did not know that her sons could help her in any way. Being considered an enemy alien she was afraid to ask for any help. These sons were her only support before. When visited, she was sick and supported by a son-in-law.

Mrs. R. is 65. Her husband is too feeble to work. Mrs. R. works as a house maid to support herself. Four of her children are married and have large families of their own to support. One son is paralyzed. As a result the father is living away from his wife, with a single daughter, who works in a factory.

Mrs. G. 60 years old is divorced from her husband. She is living alone and has $2 a week income from rented property. She says she has not bought any clothing for the past eight years, as she makes use of her dead mother's clothes. She was sick all last year, but could not afford a doctor or even medicine. Out of the $2 per week she has to support herself and pay the taxes.

Mr. R. is 61 years old. He is a widower. He has one married child. Since her husband has gone to war. Mr. R. took over the support of his daughter and her two children. When visited he was unable to find suitable work on account of his age.

L. C., a widow of 65, was left without means of support when her two sons were drafted. They are now in France and she has not received an allotment from them. She has two married daughters but as they have families of their own they cannot help her.

Mrs. K., a widow of 75, is forced to support a consumptive child who cannot work. She has another son in an asylum. Despite her age, she still works as a janitress and supports her son.

Mrs. R. is 72 years old. She is a widow and is taking care of two grandchildren whose father is at war. When she undertook to do this, her main support was a single girl, who was a telephone operator. This daughter is not working now due to illness. Mrs. R.'s only income is $10 a week from property rent.

B. K. is 56 years old. He is crippled, sickly and can do little work. His one single daughter is also feeble and cannot work more than a few weeks at a time. In addition, one of his married daughters, who was deserted by her husband, is depending upon him for support.

Mr. F. is 55 years old. He has a large family to feed and clothe. Through his own efforts alone, he cannot make ends meet. In order to help out, he has taken his oldest son out of school to help support the family. The boy is about 15 or 16 years old.

Mrs. M. H. is a widow, age 72. She formerly was supported by her son. A year ago, while at work, her son broke his leg through an accident, and has not been able to work since. Besides his mother, the son has a wife and four children to look after. He receives about $20 per month compensation. The son's wife, during the night, to help out, does cleaning in a public school house.

Mr. S. is 52 years old. He has a wife and four children to support. His back was broken at work before the compensation law came into effect. His oldest child is 14 and works out with her mother to help support the family.

Mrs. H. is 80 years old. She has worked all her life and until a week ago took in washing. She is now in bed, unable to get up. One of her daughters, 58 years of age, although crippled, manages to earn about $4 a week by cleaning. These two women are depending upon another daughter who takes care of the home by day and cleans offices at night.

Mr. M. age 74; a widower, worked as blacksmith for a structural iron concern for 25 years. Twelve years ago he broke down on account of the heavy work. Finding him unfit for work, the company discharged him. His only support now is a daughter who works as a clerk in an office.

Mr. and Mrs. F., age 72 and 68 respectively, and living together. They have $1,500 in the bank and they tried to live on the interest, but this interest was not sufficient to meet their needs. They are, therefore, continually drawing from the principal, and very much worried about living longer than the money will last them.

Mrs. P. is 74 years old. In order to support a crippled husband, who cannot work, she takes in sewing, making an average of $4 a week. As she is very feeble herself, she cannot work for weeks at a time, during which period the couple are forced to go with very little to eat. Their children refuse to support them.

H. G., who is 75 years old, is very sick as a result of paralytic strokes. Earlier in his life he was a blacksmith, but is totally incapacitated now. Moreover, he needs constant attention. Mrs. G., who is 74, cannot tend to him, as she is feeble herself, and so the son must stay home from work and tend to his father.

Mrs. C., age 60, supports her husband, who is disabled, on $5 a week which she earns by taking in washing. She has one son in the army but receives no allotment from him as he is married. This woman still keeps out of debt and manages to get along on her $5 per week.

Mrs. M., 60 years of age, a widow, is taking care of two grandchildren whose mother is dead and whose father is in military service. When visited, she had not gotten anything as yet from her son-in-law or from the Government. The son-in-law claimed, however, that he had made an allotment.

Mrs. C. aged 65 is a widow. Her only source of income is her daughter, who earns $12 a week. Mrs. C.'s sister is also dependent on the young daughter. This girl, the mother claims, is sacrificing her whole life to support her mother and aunt.

Mr. W. is 75 and his wife is 70. Mr. W. has been blind for 2 years and is unable to work. They have two sons. One has a large family of his own and is not able to support his aged parents and the other, who has been their main support, was drafted. Mrs. W. now goes out washing and cleaning in order to meet the necessary expenses.

A. L. solves the problem of living in old age by stopping with each of her several married daughters for short periods of time. She makes the rounds at short intervals.

W. C. A. age 50, drinks to excess. He does not support his family. His wife, age 43, supports the family by working in a factory. In addition, the husband spends most of the money she earns on drink.

When Mr. S. was well and young he was a laborer in Reading, and earned as much as $5.50 a week. This he has been unable to do for the past 15 years, as he has been suffering from rheumatism and dropsy. He is now 66 years of age. He is supported by his feeble wife, who, in addition to taking care of her husband, is also supporting an idiotic grandchild, 19 years of age, whose both parents are dead. Mrs. S. derives her income partly by taking in washing and partly by begging.

Until eight weeks ago, Mrs. R. aged 69, whose husband 70 years of age did not work since 1900, when he was injured while at work in a Pittsburgh steel mill, took in washing for her living. This she is now unable to do as she is too weak. Her one married daughter that helps support the aged couple can no longer do so, as her own husband is now paralyzed. Her other daughter is a widow with small children and can hardly earn enough to support herself. Mrs. R. never asked for charity and would not listen to any such suggestions. She was still hoping to get well and take in washing again, and said she will never go to the poorhouse as long as she is still able to do some work.

(b). Typical Stories of Almshouse Inmates.

Mrs. C., a resident of the Philadelphia Almshouse, is a widow 70 years old. Since her husband's death she has worked in a restaurant as a cook and had managed to save up about $1,000. On this, she expected to live through her declining days. But the bank in which she had deposited her money failed and with it went Mrs. C.'s money and hopes. Being too old to secure further employment she was forced to seek the poorhouse as her place of shelter.

Mrs. H., a widow 80 years of age, is an inmate of the same almshouse. While her husband was living, he made good money and the two bought a little property. When her husband died she borrowed some money to meet certain emergencies and gave a mortgage on her home. After a time she hired out as a cook in order to pay off her debt. This she could not accomplish and the property was taken away from her. Having no children who could help her, and being very old, she had no other alternative but to enter the poorhouse.

K. L., 57 years of age, claims that her son is making $50 a week, but refuses to support her, although the court has placed an order on him to that effect. She charges that in order to get her out of the way her son had her committed to the poorhouse.

B. L. is 61. She is single. When her father died, he left her enough money to live on. She lived on this for some time until a brother swindled her out of it. Having no other means of support she was compelled to go to the poorhouse.

Mary F. is 56 years old and single. She has no one in this world except a married sister. This sister kept her for some time. When Mary got sick and required some attention, her sister's husband refused to keep her any longer and she was forced to go to the almshouse.

Mrs. B. is a widow 80 years of age. When her husband died he left her $2,000. She lived on this and took care of her son who was left a widower with a number of small children. Finally she got sick and was compelled to go to a hospital. Most of her money was used up on medicine and doctor bills. After being discharged from the hospital and her money all gone she was sent to the almshouse. As a result of this, her son's family is broken her son to place her in the almshouse.

Old Elizabeth C., 74 years of age, had lived for some time after her husband's death with her son who is fairly prosperous. On account of disagreements with her daughter-in-law, E. C. claims, the latter had succeeded in inducing her son to place her in the almshouse.

Mrs. R.'s husband, at one time, was the owner of three butcher shops and several mills. When he died, the papers of possession were stolen and others substituted in their place. She has not a cent left now. Her one son, when last heard from, was a traveling salesman, but this was a long time ago.

Mrs. D. is a widow of 73 years of age and almost totally blind. At her husband's death she was left a house and lot. Her son-in-law induced her to sell the house and lot for $600. Mrs. D. then went back to Germany, the country of her birth, and left the $600 with her son-in-law. When she came back to this country her money was refused her. Shortly afterwards, a $300 life endowment policy came due, but she claims to have signed it over to her son-in-law, not knowing what she was doing, because of her defective sight. She was then sent to the almshouse.

(c). Cases of Abandoned Parents Taken from the Records of the Municipal Court of Philadelphia

J. H., a widower of 80 years, came to court and said that he had had a son Patrick, who had died in the Philadelphia Hospital, leaving him $2,000 to keep him for the rest of his life. Soon after the funeral, Mr. H.'s daughter took him to an attorney's office for the avowed purpose of signing some papers concerning the funeral expenses. Not being able to read, he did this and later found that he had signed over all his money. He was then refused admittance to his daughter's home and was told to go back to the place where he had been living before. Up to the time of applying for aid from the court, Mr. H. had been stopping with a poor friend of his, who, however, could not keep him much longer.

Mrs. B. is 56 years old. When her husband died their nine children were placed in homes. She knows little about them now. At present she works in a hospital as a scrub woman earning $25 a month. Outside of this, she has no means of support. Three of her sons, however, are in the service and have promised to help her. In addition to this she asks that her other sons, James and Joseph, give her $1 a week each. Joseph is a brakeman on the Pennsylvania Railroad and lives in Delaware. When James was called to court he said that his mother drank to excess. That she was usually drunk when she had money and caused disturbances. He said that she was a disgrace to the family and though he knew she would get drunk on the money, he would, however, give her a dollar a week. He did not want his address made known to his mother for fear of annoyance.

Mrs. M., 62 years, has been living since the death of her husband, with one of her sons. One day, coming home from a visit to a friend, she found a note from her son's wife, stating that if she did not leave her son's home, the wife would leave her husband. Rather than break up the domestic happiness of her boy, she immediately left and went to the home of one of her daughters. Being thrust out of her son's home had completely upset her and now she wanted to live by herself. For this purpose she asked that her son contribute $2 a week and her daughter $1 a week towards her support.

M. C. R., age 65, came into court and said that he was living with one of his married daughters. Although he was receiving a pension of $12 per month from the Pencoyd Iron Works, it was not enough for his support. Consequently he asked that his son John pay him $2 and Jacob and Samuel $1 per week. Letters were written to the sons to come to court. They all agreed to pay their father $1 a week. The papers were signed and the case was temporarily dropped. Some few weeks later Mr. R. came to court and said that Jacob and Samuel paid very regularly and that John did not pay at all. When John was asked why he had not paid, he said that he could not afford it on account of the high cost of living. A Probation Officer investigated the financial conditions of John and found that he was retired from the grocery business, owned property and had a bank account. He also had a jitney business. The Probation Officer then went to the other sons and found they were only making $15 a week, and had wives and large families to support, but were satisfied with the agreement. When John was called to the Court for non-payments, he said that all his property was made over in his wife's name. And in regard to his jitney business, he claimed he received very few orders. However, the court insisted that he pay the amount stipulated. A few days later Mr. R. came to the court and said that he was now working and could support himself and that he wanted the orders vacated on his sons. A week had not passed before Mr. R.'s married daughter came to Court and said that her father had never been able to work and was now living with her. She believed that her father had been taken to Court by his sons, and as he could not read had signed the rescinding paper without knowing what he was signing. John absolutely refused to pay his father anything. The other sons agreed to pay what the court stated. But before matters could be arranged, and John made to pay, Mr. R. died, which closed the case automatically.

Mr. A. D., who is 73, came to court and said that he could not get steady work on account of his rheumatism. Consequently he found it hard to pay board to his daughter, Elizabeth. When he asked his children for help they became impudent and refused. The children, when called to court, said that they were willing to give their father a home and to provide for him, if only he would keep away from Elizabeth, with whom he drank freely. When one son was in the Navy, they said, the father received $15 per month as an allotment, but spent it on drink instead of on his home. Mrs. A. D. is an inmate of the insane ward at the Philadelphia Hospital at the same time. On asking A. D. whether he would stay away from Elizabeth, he replied that he would stay away from the whole family and live in a furnished room if his children would only pay his board. A Probation Officer went to the home of Elizabeth and found her working in a factory, making $5 a week. Her home was very clean and comfortable. All that Mr. D. wanted from his children was enough so that he would not be entirely dependent on Elizabeth. On questioning Elizabeth's employer it was found that she was a steady and honest worker. On interviewing Elizabeth herself, she said that she and her father could not agree with the rest of her family and that she was willing to support her father without the help of them. She had a very good appearance and did not look like a drinking woman. The people in the neighborhood of the D. home, however, insisted that both Elizabeth and her father had a very bad reputation. They stated that they were both worthless and that it was a shame that the three respectable members of the family had to suffer for them. Before the court could take action, Mr. D. got drunk and was committed to the alcoholic ward of the Philadelphia Hospital.

Mary R., daughter of Mrs. W., said in court that she wanted support for her mother from her brother John, who was a bridge builder. She said that she had supported her mother for 5 years and that John refused to help her. John came to court and said that his mother had lived with him about 5 years ago and that she did not know that he had been asked to help her. He said that he was willing to give his mother $2 a week and give her a home but he knew that she would refuse that. He signed an agreement to pay $2 a week. Some time later Mary R. came to court and said that John had made no payments as yet, and that he was now working at Hog Island. Alice B., with whom John was living, came to court and paid $7 for John. She said that John was making $60 a week at Hog Island. Payments were then very regular for several weeks, when suddenly they stopped. On investigation, it was found that John was in the hospital at Hog Island on account of an accident. He said that as soon as he was well enough to work he would resume his payments.

Sam M., husband of Mrs. A.'s daughter Adella, one day told her that he wanted to borrow $200 from a building association. He asked Mrs. A. to sign a paper as security for him, which she did. However, instead of this being for the purpose stated, she signed away her right to her property. Her house is now under the daughter's name. Mrs. A. is 80 years old. When Mr. M. was called to court he said that he had taken over the property because Mrs. A. was too old to look after it. He said that there was 6 months interest due on the mortgage, that the taxes and water rent had not been paid for a year and that the trust company wanted the mortgage considerably reduced. He said that he was willing to give the property back to his mother-in-law and also claimed that he had supported her for some time. A Probation Officer interviewed Adella, who said that she knew her father left enough money to maintain her mother till the end of her life, but that she did not know what had become of the money. She also stated that a son had left her $500 in cash. She claimed that she had offered her mother a home but she soon became dissatisfied.

Mrs. K. and her husband, being of a ripe old age, had not sufficient strength to go into the world and earn a living. They had five children, three sons and two daughters. And no one of the children was able to support both of his parents. Consequently the old folks had been separated after a lifetime of struggling, working and living together. Mrs. K. was living with a widowed daughter while her husband was staying with a son. Mrs. K. thought that if her other children contributed something towards her support that her widowed daughter would be able to keep them both. She was very anxious to live with her husband. But the widowed daughter was not in favor with the rest of the family, who said that she was mean and made their mother work for the little returns she got. One son said that he alone, without any help from the family, would take his mother and give her a better home than that which she had. He was not able, however, to support both of his parents. He refused to give any money to his mother so long as she was staying with her daughter, as he claimed that she would never see any of it.

Mrs. Q., a widow aged 63, claimed that of five sons, but one, William, gave her anything towards her support. The court interviewed the children and one by one they either claimed that they had families of their own to support or that they were out of work. Joseph came to court with an attorney saying that his mother was an habitual drunkard and scold, and that he wanted her committed to a home or hospital. After a few weeks at the St. Francis Home, Mrs. Q. was taken away from there. She had but few clothes, but was in good physical condition. She went to the post-office with a Probation Officer to get her mail. There was $14 for her from her son William. She also had $15 under her skirt and she wanted to take all but $2 and deposit it in the bank where she had an account. She then went to look for a room but would not pay more than $1.50 per week. Not finding one to her liking she went to the home of her daughter. Here a quarrel ensued as the daughter did not want to let her mother in the house because her little girl was sick and the noise of Mrs. Q., she claimed, would harm the child. Mrs. Q. then went to her son's house and again met with refusal at the hands of her daughter-in-law. The daughter-in-law would not have her under any conditions, so Mrs. Q. returned to her daughter, who finally agreed to keep her until she found a room. She stated, however, that if Mrs. Q. made any further trouble between her and her husband that she would have her committed.

Mrs. O. came to court and said that she and her husband were living together, but as her husband was a cripple he could not earn their support. She said she was a seamstress but could work no longer as she had to take care of her husband. They had eight children of whom five were married and three single. Two of the sons were in the Navy. Mrs. O. came to court thinking that between the boys, enough could be given to keep her and her husband together.

Mrs. M. appeared in court and said that Mrs. H., 77 years of age, came to live in her house two years ago. She said that Mrs. H. had inherited some money and intended going to a home for the blind. But after the debts had been paid off she had not enough money for the admittance fee. Mrs. M. stated that none of Mrs. H.'s children cared for her and as she was no relation to her, she thought that another home should be provided. A Probation Officer called on a daughter-in-law of Mrs. H., who said that she had kept her mother-in-law up until two years ago. One day when she was out working Mrs. M. came and took the old lady to her home because she (the daughter-in-law), had wanted to put Mrs. H. in a home for the poor. She said that her husband would be willing to contribute a little to the support of his mother, but as he was earning only $15 a week, he could not give much. Mrs. H. was finally committed to the Philadelphia Hospital.

Mrs. L. came to court and said that she had been, for some time, supported by her married daughter, Josephine, who had eight little children of her own to support. Her son, Edward, she said was comfortably situated, and could help her. She asked that he be made to pay her $1.50 a week. The court then sent a letter to Edward. In the mean time, before a reply from Edward had been received, Mrs. Annie M., another widowed daughter, came to court and said that she was not able to give her mother support but that if her brother would pay the board, as he was able to do, she and her sister would supply their mother with clothing and other necessities. The court placed an order of $1.50 on Edward. After about six weeks Mrs. L. came to court and said that her son did not pay his court order regularly. He was finally made to pay his mother $10 a month.

Mr. John W., aged 68, said that on account of rheumatism, he had not worked steadily for three years. He had been living with his son Walter for some time but he wanted John and William, his other sons, to contribute to his support. He asked for $1.50 from each. John and William agreed, in court, to pay the $1.50 a week. A few weeks later Mr. W. came to court complaining of non-payments. He said that he had moved away from his son Walter. He earned his room and board through odd jobs. He said he left the home of Walter because he had quarreled with Walter's wife. Mr. W. complained repeatedly of not getting his money from his sons. When Walter came to court, he said that his wife got disgusted with his father because he got drunk and on account of this the latter left his home. He said that he would take him back if he kept straight but he could not afford to pay more than $0.50 a week. Later Mr. W. reported that John was back in his payments. He said that John was working at Hog Island making $40 a week and could afford to pay. This was investigated and found true, but in the meantime, Mr. W. got a job himself at Hog Island as switchman.

at $15 a week, and did not need further assistance from his sons.

Mrs. H. is 53 years old. Her husband deserted her seventeen years ago, and ever since, she had a hard time working and trying to bring up her four children. She now has rheumatism, is very nervous and needs help to support herself. She asked that her son Harry pay her $3 a week. On being questioned, Harry stated that he had just started work at $13 a week and that he could not afford to pay $3. However, he was willing to give $1.50. His mother agreed to this and the necessary papers were signed. After some time Mrs. H. came to court and complained that the payments were made very irregularly. At about this time Harry married and hearing, through the Burns Detective Agency, that his father had recently died in Cleveland, leaving some property, moved to that city with his wife, leaving Mrs. H. without any means of support.

Mrs. M. appeared in court and complained that although her sons were helping to support her, they were not allotting enough money. The sons, on the other hand, stated that their mother was very eccentric and a crank, and through her evil disposition has caused the disruption of the family. A Probation Officer investigating these charges found that Mrs. M. was considered, by neighbors, quite a quiet woman. Mrs. M. was under the doctor's care for asthma, and was unable to work and support herself. She claimed that all her children were making good wages and could contribute more than they were at present, without inconveniencing themselves. One was a lawyer, filling a government position, at Washington. She insisted upon having her allotments increased, but her children refused.

Mrs. K. was living in a furnished room with her daughter Laura. She said she was 65 years old, a widow for 30 years and had raised her family through her own efforts. She had a pension of $24 a month. Mrs. K. was suffering from heart trouble. She said she was put out of her house by her son, who previous to his marriage was a very dutiful boy. He had purchased a house for her and the title was in her name. Lately he frequently threatened her life and called her vile names. Mrs. K. would like to collect the rent on the house or have her son vacate. When the deed of the house was drawn up it was stated that Mrs. K. was to have a room in it for life. Now on account of her son, she was afraid to go home. When called to court the son was very indignant and said that he only bought the house in his mother's name so that if anything ever happened to him she would always have a home. He also said that his mother was jealous, quick tempered and unrelenting. He claimed that his sister, Laura, was the main trouble in the case as she abused his wife and children and had tried to break up the home. The son said that he never threatened his mother and that he refused to give her any money as she had a pension. He said, however, that he would take her back into the house but that he would not take back Laura. Mrs. R. refused to live with her son, under these conditions, and continued living with her daughter in a furnished room. Here she took sick and after lingering three months died.

Mrs. B., aged 61, said in court, that through an accident, two years ago, she had not been able to work. She asked the four of her sons to give her a dollar a week each for support. She also wanted one of her sons, who was a widower, to give her a home. One of the sons came to court and absolutely refused to give his mother any support. He said that on account of drunkenness she had never been a mother to him. It was through her conduct that her husband lost his mind and died. He said that she was never able to live with any of her sons on account of alcohol and that the three younger girls were adopted when very young and that his mother had never bothered to find out where they were.

Mr. R., son-in-law of Mrs. A. B., had been supporting his mother-in-law, who was 72 years old, for 12 years. He earned $1,400, a year but thought that A. B.'s sons should help support the old lady. A. B. used laudanum to the extent of three ounces a week and was under the doctor's care. Mr. R. wanted two sons to contribute $1.50 a week each towards the support of Mrs. A. B. When called to court one son said that he was only making $13 per week and had a family of six children to support. He said however that he was willing to do all he could to help his mother. Mr. R. called again at court to see what had been done. He said that it was the price of the drug and that the doctor's bills that embarrassed him. The other son wrote to the court stating that he has honestly kept his agreement with Mr. R. to pay $1.25 per week for his mother's drug. He also stated that he was making but $18 a week. A conference was held at court where one son agreed to pay $1.25 per week and signed the papers accordingly, while the other refused to make any written statement, saying that his word was good.

Mrs. D., age 76, formerly lived with her son Edward. One day returning from a visit she found the door locked and she was refused admittance. She is now living with a friend who is willing to keep her for two dollars a week. Mrs. D. asked for this sum from her sons and was refused.

C. F. is sick and nervous and has to stop work for a while. She has two small children who are not able to work. She asked her married son, Frank, for help, but he said that he had to look after his wife first. Frank has passed the examination for paymaster in the Navy Yard. Frank never replied to the court's letter, but Mrs. F. said that he was making $100 a month and that his wife was making the same. They have no children and Mrs. F. thinks that they are able to give her $2 a week. Mrs. F.'s two young children are very delicate. On being interviewed Frank said that he was boarding and that it cost him $20 a week. He also said that his wife was sick and had to work to help pay the doctor bills. Under the circumstances, his salary was insufficient to help his mother. A Probation officer interviewed Mrs. F. who said that one of her daughters was working for the Bell Telephone Co., making $10 a week. Of this she gave $9.50 to her mother. That was her sole support. Mrs. F. wanted an order put on her son Frank to pay her $2 a week as long as she was not able to work. This, she said, would go to the younger children and not to herself.

REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS ON UNIFORM
STATE LAWS.

To His Excellency, William C. Sproul, Governor of Pennsylvania:

The first National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws was held at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., August 24, 1892.

Pennsylvania was first represented by Honorable William H. Staake, Chairman, Philadelphia, Richard C. Dale, Philadelphia, and Thomas Patterson, Pittsburgh, as Commissioners, at the meeting held August 19-20, 1901, at Denver, Colorado. From that time the Commissioners were appointed under various Acts of Assembly, which created a Commission for four years only.

The Act of April 20, 1917, P. L. 20, provided for a permanent Commission, the members of which were to be appointed every four years, and the undersigned have been appointed pursuant to the provisions of that act.

This Act of Assembly provides that the said Board "shall make a report of its transactions, together with advice and recommendations as to proposed uniform laws to the Governor of the Commonwealth, which report shall be by him transmitted to the Legislature."

The "National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws," is composed of the representatives of the various states, territories and district possessions of the United States. This Conference meets annually with sessions lasting about one week, in the same place, and just prior to, the annual meetings of the American Bar Association.

Two sessions of the Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws have been held since our last report to the Governor of our Commonwealth; one session in 1917, at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., from August 29th to September 3d, inclusive, which was attended by the representatives of thirty-six states and of the Philippine Islands; the other, at Cleveland, Ohio, in 1918, from August 22d to August 27th, inclusive, which was attended by representatives from thirty-one different Jurisdictions. The three Commissioners from Pennsylvania attended all of the sessions of each National Conference.

The present officers of the National Conference are:

W. A. Blount, President, Pensacola, Florida; Hugh H. Brown, vice-president, Tonopah, Nevada; W. O. Hart, treasurer, 134 Carondelet St., New Orleans, La.; Manley O. Hudson, secretary, University of Missouri, Columbia, Missouri.

Executive Committee: Eugene C. Massie, Chairman, 1136 Mutual Building, Richmond, Va.; Henry Stockbridge, 75 Gunther Building, Baltimore, Md.; J. Hansell Merrill, Thomasville, Ga.; George B. Young, Heaton Block, Montpelier, Vt.; John R. Hardin, Prudential Building, Newark, N. J.

Ex-Officio: President, vice-president, treasurer, secretary and Ex-President, William H. Staake, 648 City Hall, Philadelphia, Pa.

The methods of procedure of the National Conference of Commissioners have been fully explained in previous reports. The Commissioners, usually three from each State, are appointed by the Governors thereof and are almost exclusively lawyers, judges and professors of law in various universities and colleges, who give their time without compensation and, in many instances, pay their own expenses while attending the meetings of the Conference.

The Conference has held twenty-eight annual meetings. It has sought to confine its attention to subjects upon which there was great need of uniformity in legislation. It has not aimed to prepare a multitude of laws, but it has endeavored to make each proposed law which is recommended to the various states for adoption, a model of legislation upon the subject with which it deals. Therefore, the output of the Conference has not been large.

The work has been carefully done. When it is suggested to the Conference that a uniform law should be prepared upon a particular subject, consideration is first given to the question whether or not such subject is appropriate for uniform legislation. In the event that it is decided to be so, an expert especially familiar with the subject is employed to draft a tentative form of law, which draft is prepared in collaboration with the committee to whom its preparation has been assigned. After consideration by the committee, the tentative draft is submitted and carefully considered by the Conference. No law is recommended until it has been considered by at least two annual conferences, and many of the acts already recommended have received consideration at many more than two sessions.

The following acts have been from time to time recommended for adoption:

1. Uniform Domestic Acknowledgment Act.
2. Uniform Execution of Wills Act.
3. Uniform Probate of Foreign Wills Act.
4. Uniform Table of Weights and Measures Act.
5. Uniform Negotiable Instruments Act.
6. Uniform Divorce Act.
7. Uniform Divorce Procedure Act.
8. Uniform Insurance Policies Act.
9. Uniform Sales Act.
10. Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act.
11. Uniform Annulment of Marriage and Divorce Act.
12. Uniform Bills of Lading Act.
13. Uniform Family Desertion Act.
14. Uniform Marriage License Act.
15. Uniform Child Labor Law.
16. Uniform Marriage Evasion Act.
17. Uniform Foreign Acknowledgments Act.
18. Uniform Cold Storage Act.
19. Uniform Workmen's Compensation Act.
20. Uniform Land Registration Act.
21. Uniform Limited Partnership Act.
22. Uniform Act for Extradition of Persons of Unsound Mind.

Of these, Pennsylvania has adopted the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Act, Sales Act, Warehouse Receipts Act, Bills of Lading Act, Stock Transfer Act, Partnership Act, and Limited Partnership Act, which are all of the utmost importance as affecting "business transactions and social life" and have been generally accepted as most useful statutes.

At the Conference in 1917 a Uniform Flag Law was recommended, and at the Conference of 1918 a Uniform Fraudulent Conveyance Act, Uniform Conditional Sales Act, and Uniform Compulsory Work Act, were recommended to the various states.

The commissioners recommend, and will present to the Legislature for adoption, at the session of 1919, the Uniform Fraudulent Conveyance Act, the Uniform Conditional Sales Act, and the Uniform Act for the Extradition of Persons of Unsound Mind. The first two of these Acts will complete the set of commercial uniform laws, which have so far been recommended by the Conference.

Pennsylvania has adopted all of the other uniform commercial laws. These laws have been well received and have been passed by the leading commercial states, such as New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, Massachusetts and Maryland.

There is abundant reasons for a Uniform Conveyance Act.

Existing confusions in the law relating to conveyance in fraud of creditors make the adoption by the several states of an act which shall put an end to the confusions by concise and clear statements of legal principles pertaining to the subject a matter of practical importance.

The confusions and uncertainties of the existing law are due primarily to three things:

First, the absence of any well recognized, definite conception of insolvency.

Second, failure to make clear the persons legally injured by a given fraudulent conveyance.

Third, the attempt to make the Statue of Elizabeth cover all conveyances which wrong creditors, even though the actual intent to defraud does not exist.

The Statue of Elizabeth condemns conveyances as fraudulent only when made with the "intent" to "hinder, delay or defraud." There are many conveyances which wrong creditors where an intent to defraud on the part of the debtor does not in fact exist. In order to avoid these conveyances, the courts have called to their assistance presumptions of law as to intent, and in equity have pushed presumptions of fraud as a fact to an unwarranted extent; with the result that, while in the main the decisions under the facts do justice, the reasoning supporting them leaves much to be desired.

In the Act as drafted all possibility of a presumption of law as to intent is avoided. Certain conveyances which the courts have in practice condemned, such as a gift by an insolvent, are declared fraudulent irrespective of intent. On the other hand, while all conveyances with intent to defraud creditors (see Section 7) are declared fraudulent, it is expressly stated that the intent must be "actual intent, as distinguished from intent presumed as a matter of law."

The Act as drafted makes few changes in the law of any state. In this subject, as in many others in our law, need for definite statutory statement does not arise so much from actual conflict between the law of different jurisdictions arising out of clear cut differences in judicial opinion, as from the confusion of thought manifested in judicial opinion, which renders the law in a great degree uncertain in all jurisdictions.

The chief benefit to be derived from the adoption of a uniform act on conveyances in fraud of creditors is that, if properly enforced, it will give a known certainty to the law which does not now possess.

A statement of the process by which the act has been developed may be of interest. In 1915 the Conference directed its Committee on Commercial Law to prepare the draft of an act to make uniform the law relating to fraudulent conveyances. The Committee secured the services as draftsmen of Wm. Draper Lewis, Professor of Law in the University of Pennsylvania, who in his work for the Committee acted for the New York Drafting Association. The first tentative draft was submitted by the Committee to the Conference in 1916, the second tentative draft in 1917, and the third in 1918, the Conference carefully going over, discussing and amending the act section by section at each session. The completed Act represents therefore most careful work.

The Uniform Conditional Sales Act is one of the most important commercial acts that has emanated from the Conference of Commissioners.

The unsatisfactory nature of the law governing conditional sales of chattel property has often been the subject of comment. The fact that the buyer is immediately intrusted with possession of the property and the power to use it as if it were his own, offers easy opportunity for defrauding both the buyer's creditors and subpurchasers from him. An attempt has been made in most of the United States, but by no means in all of them, to guard against this difficulty by enacting statutes which make record or filing of the conditional sale contract a condition of its validity against innocent third persons. These statutes, however, are by no means uniform in their requirements and subject a conditional seller of goods who sells goods all over the country (and there are many manufacturers who dispose of their products in this way) to great inconvenience in discovering and complying with the different statutory regulation. Moreover, the law governing the subject has further defects. Most courts have failed to recognize fully that a conditional sale is in its essence similar to a chattel mortgage; the seller's title being retained merely for the purpose of security, and the buyer acquiring from the outset not merely an executory contractual right, but a property interest in the goods. The result has been a great conflict of authority in regard to the rights of the parties. These circumstances in connection with the magnitude of the business carried on by means of conditional sales (the annual interstate business alone being estimated at nearly half a billion of dollars) make the subject a most important one for regulation by a uniform statute in the several states. Moved by these considerations, the Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws at its meeting at Salt Lake City in August 1915, directed its Committee on Commercial Law to prepare an Act to make uniform the law on the subject and to employ a draftsman for that purpose. In accordance with these directions the Committee employed Professor George G. Bogert of Cornell University to draft such a law. A first tentative draft was prepared by him, and, after criticism and consideration by the Committee on Commercial Law, was submitted to the Conference at its meeting in August 1916, at Chicago, when it was examined and discussed with the assistance of the draftsman, section by section, and a number of amendments were tenatively adopted. Soon thereafter, in accordance with instructions given by the Conference, the draftsman presented a second tentative draft to the Committee on Commercial Law, which was carefully considered and discussed by the Committee and with the changes made after this discussion was presented to the Conference at its meeting in August 1917 at Saratoga. The revised draft was again carefully discussed section by section with the aid of the draftsman, and with further amendments was again submitted to the Committee. A new tentative draft was prepared and was once more considered by the Committee. With the light gained by further discussion and conferences with lawyers and mercantile men whose business gave them expert knowledge of the subject, further amendments were made, and a third tentative draft submitted to the Conference at its meeting in Cleveland, August, 1918. There the draft was, for the third time, carefully examined and discussed section by section by the Conference, and, with amendments then made, was finally adopted and recommended for passage.

During the whole or part of the time when the Act was in preparation the following Commissioners were members of the Committee on Commercial Law.

The uniform Bill for the Extradition of persons of unsound mind, was prepared by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws, and finally approved by the Conference on August 26th, 1916. The bill has already been enacted in six States. It was under consideration in the National Conference for a number of years and before final approval received most critical review and careful amendment in two successive annual sessions.

The necessity for the legislation arises out of the lack of provision under the constitution of the United States for the return of persons of unsound mind to the State of their domicile, no legal process whatsoever having existed for that purpose.

The general scheme of the bill is that of the Act of Congress for extradition of fugitives from justice, and the bill is guarded by, and most conservatively confined to, three classes of persons only, who may be safely provided for by such legislation, viz:

(1) Those under actual detention by law in asylums, etc., for the insane.

(2) Those already determined by legal proceedings to be of unsound mind, and

(3) Those who flee from their legal domicile after actual personal service of process in proceedings there pending to have them declared of unsound mind.

The Constitution of the United States provides specifically for compulsory return of a fugitive from justice charged with crime, to the State having jurisdiction of the offense. But the Constitution is silent as to fugitives legally adjudged insane or under actual confinement as such. Therefore this latter subject cannot be regulated by Federal legislation, but must be dealt with by uniform enactment of the States. The reasons for such regulation are abundant.

Substantially the same procedure existing in all the States, there is no presumption that the rights of a fugitive lunatic will be better protected in a State to which he may flee rather than in the State where he was adjudicated non compos mentis, or was legally under restraint because insane, and which is probably that of his domicile where his relatives and friends reside.

In every State there are safeguards of investigation and procedure, and the existence of insanity in a given case is merely an issue of fact and triable as such whether the inquiry arises on petition to commit to an institution, or for an adjudication in lunacy; or whether it arises upon an application to discharge an insane person from custody or to supersede the commission in lunacy. That issue is properly triable in the State of the residence of the lunatic, ordinarily the State of his restraint. Primarily the State of the domicile should be that of the forum, and in instances of flight by insane persons to other States, there would seem to be every propriety in returning them upon executive requisition to the demanding State without first trying the issue of insanity in the State where they have sought refuge.

If the proposed uniform statute had been in force in the Thaw case, all the litigation in New Hampshire and on appeal from the Federal Court in that State would have been obviated, for Thaw would have been returned forthwith to New York upon gubernatorial requisition. And no resort would have been had by the New York authorities to the subterfuge of an unmaintainable charge for conspiracy to procure his return to New York, when their real purpose was to reincarcerate him in the hospital at Matteawan, where he had been rightfully committed by the earlier proceedings in the New York Courts.

It will remove an anomaly now existing in the laws of those states which have not adopted it, by permitting the extradition under proper safeguards, of lunatics who have escaped from confinement, under a decree of the courts of their domiciles.

The Commissioners are glad to report that each year shows a growing interest in the work of securing uniformity of legislation, and the states which have not heretofore given financial support to the work of the Conference are gradually doing so. The great commercial states of Pennsylvania and New York have recognized the value of this Conference from the beginning, and its work is commanding the confidence of the courts, of the profession, and of the country at large.

The members of the Conference of Commissioners receive no compensation for their services. This service is prompted by higher motives than compensation, and by a desire to save annoyance from the variant and conflicting laws, and to avoid the perplexity, uncertainty and confusion which would hinder freedom of trade and cause unnecessary insecurity of contracts resulting in needless litigation and a miscarriage of justice. Lack of uniformity is a serious impediment to the prosperity of the country.

Respectfully submitted,

WILLIAM H. STAAKE,
Chairman,

WALTER GEORGE SMITH,

WM. M. HARGEST,

Secretary,
Commissioners.
